(h) Nothing in this section shall be construed as the assumption of a liability by the United States for the payment of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, nor shall any payment under this section be construed as the satisfaction, in whole or in part, of any of such awards, or as extinguishing or diminishing the liability of Germany for the satisfaction in full of such awards, but shall be considered only as an advance by the United States until all the payments from Germany in satisfaction of the awards have been received. Upon any payment under this section of an amount in respect of an award, the rights in respect of the award and of the claim in respect of which the award was made shall be held to have been assigned pro tanto to the United States, to be enforced by and on behalf of the United States against Germany, in the same manner and to the same extent as such rights would be enforced on behalf of the American national.

(i) Any person who makes application for payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act.

(j) The President is requested to enter into an agreement with the German Government by which the Mixed Claims Commission will be given jurisdiction of and authorized to decide claims of the same character as those of which the commission now has jurisdiction, presented to the commission before July 1, 1928. If such agreement is entered into before January 1, 1929, awards in respect of such claims shall be certified under subsection (a) and shall be in all other respects subject to the provisions of this section.

CLAIMS OF GERMAN NATIONALS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 3. (a) There shall be a War Claims Arbiter (hereinafter referred to as the "arbiter"), who shall be appointed by the President, at a salary to be fixed by the President not in excess of $15,000 a year; or any officer or agent of the United States may be designated by the President as arbiter. Any officer or agent so designated shall receive as arbiter, notwithstanding any other provision of law, a salary to be fixed by the President in an amount, if any, which when added to any other salary will make his total salary from the United States not in excess of $15,000 a year.

(b) It shall be the duty of the arbiter, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, to hear the claims of any German national (as hereinafter defined), and to determine the fair compensation to be paid by the United States, in respect of—

(1) Any merchant vessel (including any equipment, appurtenances, and property contained therein), title to which was taken by or on behalf of the United States under the authority of the joint resolution of May 12, 1917 (40 Stat. 75). Such compensation shall be the fair value, as nearly as may be determined, of such vessel to the owner immediately prior to the time exclusive possession was taken under the authority of such joint resolution, and in its condition at such time, taking into consideration the fact that such owner could not use or permit the use of such vessel, or charter or sell or otherwise dispose of such vessel for use or delivery, prior to the termination of the war, and that the war was not terminated until July 2, 1921, except that there shall be deducted from such value any consideration paid for such vessel by the United States. The findings of the board of survey appointed under the authority of such joint resolution shall be competent evidence in any proceeding before the arbiter to determine the amount of such compensation.

(2) Any radio station (including any equipment, appurtenances, and property contained therein) which was sold to the United States by or under the direction of the Alien Property Custodian under authority of the trading with the enemy act, or any amendment thereto. Such compensation shall be the fair value, as nearly as may be determined, which such radio station would have had on July 2, 1921, if returned to the owner on such date in the same condition as on the date on which it was seized by or on behalf of the United States, or on which it was conveyed or delivered to, or seized by, the Alien Property Custodian, whichever date is earlier, except that there shall be deducted from such value any consideration paid for such radio station by the United States.

(3) Any patent (or any right therein or claim thereto, and including an application therefor, and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian to the United States. Such compensation shall be the amount, as nearly as may be determined, which would have been paid if such patent, right, claim, or application had been licensed, assigned, or sold to the United States by a citizen of the United States, except that there shall be deducted from such amount any consideration paid therefor by the United States (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(4) The use by or for the United States of any invention described in and covered by any patent (including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was conveyed, transferred, or assigned to, or seized by, the Alien Property Custodian, but not including any use during any period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or on or after the date on which such patent was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian. In determining such compensation, any defense, general or special, available to a defendant in an action for infringement or in any suit in equity for relief against an alleged infringement, shall be available to the United States.

(c) The proceedings of the arbiter under this section shall be conducted in accordance with such rules of procedure as he may prescribe. The arbiter, or any referee designated by him, is authorized to administer oaths, to hold hearings at such places within or without the United States as the arbiter deems necessary, and to contract for the reporting of such hearings. Any witness appearing for the United States before the arbiter or any such referee at any place within or without the United States may be paid the same fees and mileage as witnesses in courts of the United States. Such payments shall be made out of any funds in the German special deposit account hereinafter provided for, and may be made in advance.

(d) The arbiter may, from time to time, and shall, upon the determination by him of the fair compensation in respect of all such vessels, radio stations, and patents, make a tentative award to each claimant of the fair compensation to be paid in respect of his claim, including simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, on the amount of such compensation from July 2, 1921, to December 31, 1928, both dates inclusive. If a German national filing a claim in respect of any such vessel fails to establish to the satisfaction of the arbiter that neither the German Government nor any member of the former ruling family had at the time of the taking any interest in such vessel, either directly or indirectly, through stock ownership or control or otherwise, then (whether or not claim has been filed by or on behalf of such Government or individual) no award shall be made to such German national unless and until the extent of such interest of the German Government and of the members of the former ruling family has been determined by the arbiter. Upon such determination the arbiter shall make a tentative award in favor of such Government or individual in such amount as the arbiter determines to be in justice and equity representative of such interest, and reduce accordingly the amount available for tentative awards to German nationals filing claims in respect of the vessel, so that the aggregate of the tentative awards (including awards on behalf of the German Government and members of the former ruling family) in respect of the vessel will be within the amount of fair compensation determined under subsection (b) of this section.

(e) The total amount to be awarded under this section shall not exceed $100,000,000, minus the sum of (1) the expenditures in carrying out the provisions of this section (including a reasonable estimate for such expenditures to be incurred prior to the expiration of the term of office of the arbiter) and (2) the aggregate consideration paid by the United States in respect of the acquisition of such vessels and radio stations, and the use, license, assignment, and sale of such patents (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(f) If the aggregate amount of the tentative awards exceeds the amount which may be awarded under subsection (e), the arbiter shall reduce pro rata the amount of each tentative award. The arbiter shall enter an award of the amount to be paid each claimant, and thereupon shall certify such awards to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay the amount of the awards certified under subsection (f).

(h) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay annually (as nearly as may be) simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, upon the amount of any such award remaining unpaid, beginning January 1, 1929, until paid.

(i) The payments in respect of awards under this section shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the German special deposit account created by section 4, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, and in the order of priority provided in subsections (c) and (d) of section 4.

(j) The Secretary of the Treasury shall not pay any amount in respect of any award made to or on behalf of the German Government or any member of the former ruling family, but the amount of any such award shall be credited upon the final payment due the United States from the German Government for the purpose of satisfying the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

(k) No payment shall be made under this section unless application therefor is made, within two years after the date the award is certified, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment of any amount in respect of any award may be made, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, either in the United States or in Germany, and either in money of the United States or in lawful German money, and shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except that—

(1) If such person is deceased or is under a legal disability, payment shall be made to his legal representative, except that if the payment is not over $500 it may be made to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto, without the necessity of compliance with the requirements of law in respect of the administration of estates;

(2) In the case of a partnership, association, or corporation, the existence of which has been terminated, payment shall be made, except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto;

(3) If a receiver or trustee for the person on behalf of whom the award was made has been duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction and has not been discharged prior to the date of payment, payment shall be made to the receiver or trustee or in accordance with the order of the court; and

(4) In the case of an assignment of an award, or of an assignment (prior to the making of the award) of the claim in respect of which such award was made, by a receiver or trustee for any such person, duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, payment shall be made to the assignee.

(l) The head of any executive department, independent establishment, or agency in the executive branch of the Government, including the Alien Property Custodian and the Comptroller General, shall, upon request of the arbiter, furnish such records, documents, papers, correspondence, and information in the possession of such department, independent establishment, or agency as may assist the arbiter, furnish him statements and assistance of the same character as is described in section 188 of the Revised Statutes, and may temporarily detail any officers or employees of such department, independent establishment, or agency to assist the arbiter, or to act as a referee, in carrying out the provisions of this section. The Attorney General shall assign such officers and employees of the Department of Justice as may be necessary to represent the United States in the proceedings under this section.

(m) The arbiter, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to (1) appoint and fix the salaries of such officers, referees, and employees, without regard to the civil service laws and regulations or to the classification act of 1923, and (2) make such expenditures (including the salary of the arbiter, expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, law books, periodicals, books of reference, and printing and binding), as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section and within the funds available therefor. Any officer or employee detailed or assigned under subsection (l) shall be entitled to receive (notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary) such additional compensation as the arbiter, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. The arbiter and officers and employees appointed, detailed, or assigned shall be entitled to receive their necessary traveling expenses and actual expenses incurred for subsistence (without regard to any limitations imposed by law) while away from the District of Columbia on business required by this section.

(n) On the date on which the awards are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury under subsection (f) or the date on which the awards are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury under subsection (e) of section 6 (patent claims of Austrian and Hungarian nationals), whichever date is the later, the terms of office of the arbiter, and of the officers and employees appointed by the arbiter, shall expire, and the books, papers, records, correspondence, property, and equipment of the office shall be transferred to the Department of the Treasury.

(o) No award or tentative award shall be made by the arbiter in respect of any claim if (1) such claim is filed after the expiration of four months from the date on which the arbiter takes office, or (2) any judgment or decree awarding compensation or damages in respect thereof has been rendered against the United States, and if such judgment or decree has become final (whether before or after the enactment of this act), or (3) any suit or proceeding against the United States, or any agency thereof, is commenced or is pending in respect thereof and is not dismissed upon motion of the person by or on behalf of whom it was commenced, made before the expiration of six months from the date on which the arbiter takes office and before any judgment or decree awarding compensation or damages becomes final.

(p) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, the sum of $50,000,000, and, after the date on which the awards of the arbiter under this section are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, such additional amounts as, when added to the amounts previously appropriated, will be equivalent to the aggregate amount of such awards plus the amounts necessary for the expenditures authorized by subsections (c) and (m) of this section (expenses of administration), except that the aggregate of such appropriations shall not exceed $100,000,000.

(q) The provisions of this section shall constitute the exclusive method for the presentation and payment of claims arising out of any of the acts by or on behalf of the United States for which this section provides a remedy. Any person who files any claim or makes application for any payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act. This subsection shall not bar the presentation of a claim under section 19 (relating to the claims of certain former German nationals in respect of the taking of the vessels Carl Diederichsen and Johanne); but no award shall be made under section 19 in respect of either of such vessels to or on behalf of any person to whom or on whose behalf an award is made under this section in respect of such vessel.

(r) If the aggregate amount to be awarded in respect of any vessel, radio station, or patent is awarded in respect of two or more claims, such amount shall be apportioned among such claims by the arbiter as he determines to be just and equitable and as the interests of the claimants may appear.

(s) The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of any of the tentative awards made under subsection (d) of this section and the recommendation of the arbiter, may make such pro rata payments in respect of such tentative awards as he deems advisable, but the aggregate of such payments shall not exceed $25,000,000.

GERMAN SPECIAL DEPOSIT ACCOUNT

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby created in the Treasury a German special deposit account, into which shall be deposited all funds hereinafter specified and from which shall be disbursed all payments authorized by section 2 or 3, including the expenses of administration authorized under subsections (c) and (m) of section 3 and subsection (e) of this section.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to deposit in such special deposit account—

(1) All sums invested or transferred by the Alien Property Custodian, under the provisions of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended;

(2) The amounts appropriated under the authority of section 3 (relating to claims of German nationals); and

(3) All money (including the proceeds of any property, rights, or benefits which may be sold or otherwise disposed of, upon such terms as he may prescribe) received, whether before or after the enactment of this act, by the United States in respect of claims of the United States against Germany on account of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, out of the funds in such special deposit account, subject to the provisions of subsection (d), and in the following order of priority—

(1) To make the payments of expenses of administration authorized by subsections (c) and (m) of section 3 or subsection (e) of this section;

(2) To make so much of each payment authorized by subsection (b) of section 2 (relating to awards of the Mixed Claims Commission), as is attributable to an award on account of death or personal injury, together with interest thereon as provided in subsection (c) of section 2;

(3) To make each payment authorized by subsection (b) of section 2 (relating to awards of the Mixed Claims Commission), if the amount thereof is not payable under paragraph (2) of this subsection and does not exceed $100,000, and to pay interest thereon as provided in subsection (c) of section 2;

(4) To pay the amount of $100,000 in respect of each payment authorized by subsection (b) of section 2 (relating to awards of the Mixed Claims Commission), if the amount of such authorized payment is in excess of $100,000 and is not payable in full under paragraph (2) of this subsection. No person shall be paid under this paragraph and paragraph (3) an amount in excess of $100,000 (exclusive of interest beginning January 1, 1928), irrespective of the number of awards made on behalf of such person;

(5) To make additional payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 2 (relating to awards of the Mixed Claims Commission), in such amounts as will make the aggregate payments (authorized by such subsection) under this paragraph and paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of this subsection equal to 80 per cent of the aggregate amount of all payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 2. Payments under this paragraph shall be prorated on the basis of the amount of the respective payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 2 and remaining unpaid. Pending the completion of the work of the Mixed Claims Commission, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay such installments of the payments authorized by this paragraph as he determines to be consistent with prompt payment under this paragraph to all persons on behalf of whom claims have been presented to the commission;

(6) To pay amounts determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be payable in respect of the tentative awards of the arbiter, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (s) of section 3 (relating to awards for ships, patents, and radio stations);

(7) To pay to German nationals such amounts as will make the aggregate payments equal to 50 per cent of the amounts awarded under section 3 (on account of ships, patents, and radio stations). Payments authorized by this paragraph or paragraph (6) may, to the extent of funds available under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section, be made whether or not the payments under paragraphs (1) to (5), inclusive, of this subsection have been completed;

(8) To pay accrued interest upon the participating certificates evidencing the amounts invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (a) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the investment of 20 per cent of German property temporarily withheld);

(9) To pay the accrued interest payable under subsection (c) of section 2 (in respect of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission) and subsection (h) of section 3 (in respect of awards to German nationals);

(10) To make such payments as are necessary (A) to repay the amounts invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (a) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the investment of 20 per cent of German property temporarily withheld), (B) to pay amounts equal to the difference between the aggregate payments (in respect of claims of German nationals) authorized by subsections (g) and (h) of section 3 and the amounts previously paid in respect thereof, and (C) to pay amounts equal to the difference between the aggregate payments (in respect of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission) authorized by subsections (b) and (c) of section 2, and the amounts previously paid in respect thereof. If funds available are not sufficient to make the total payments authorized by this paragraph, the amount of payments made from time to time shall be apportioned among the payments authorized under clauses (A), (B), and (C) according to the aggregate amount remaining unpaid under each clause;

(11) To make such payments as are necessary to repay the amounts invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (b) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the investment of the unallocated interest fund); but the amount payable under this paragraph shall not exceed the aggregate amount allocated to the trusts described in subsection (c) of section 26 of such act;

(12) To pay into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts the amount of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission to the United States, on its own behalf, on account of claims of the United States against Germany; and

(13) To pay into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any funds remaining in the German special deposit account after the payments authorized by paragraphs (1) to (12) have been completed.

(d) Fifty per cent of the amounts appropriated under the authority of section 3 (relating to claims of German nationals) shall be available for payments under paragraphs (6) and (7) of subsection (c) of this section (relating to such claims) and shall be available only for such payments until such time as the payments authorized by such paragraphs have been completed.

(e) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay, from funds in the German special deposit account, such amounts, not in excess of $25,000 per annum, as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses in carrying out the provisions of this section and section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the investment of funds by the Alien Property Custodian), including personal services at the seat of government.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest and reinvest, from time to time, in bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States any of the funds in the German special deposit account, and to deposit to the credit of such account the interest or other earnings thereon.

(g) There shall be deducted from the amounts first payable under this section to any American national in respect of any debt the amount, if any, paid by the Alien Property Custodian in respect of such debt which was not credited by the Mixed Claims Commission in making its award.

CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES AND ITS NATIONALS AGAINST AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

SEC. 5. (a) The commissioner of the Tripartite Claims Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "commissioner"), selected in pursuance of the agreement of November 26, 1924, between the United States and Austria and Hungary shall, from time to time, certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the judgments and interlocutory judgments (hereinafter referred to as "awards") of the commissioner.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay (1) in the case of any such judgment, an amount equal to the principal thereof, plus the interest thereon in accordance with such judgment, and (2) in the case of any such interlocutory judgment, an amount equal to the principal thereof (converted at the rate of exchange specified in the certificate of the commissioner provided for in section 7), plus the interest thereon in accordance with such certificate.

(c) The payments authorized by subsection (b) shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the special deposit account (Austrian or Hungarian, as the case may be), created by section 7, and within the limitations hereinafter prescribed.

(d) There shall be deducted from the amount of each payment, as reimbursement for expenses incurred by the United States in respect thereof, an amount equal to one-half of 1 per cent thereof. The amount so deducted shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(e) The amounts awarded to the United States in respect of claims of the United States on its own behalf shall be payable under this section.

(f) No payment shall be made under this section (other than payments to the United States in respect of claims of the United States on its own behalf) unless application therefor is made within two years after the date of the enactment of this act in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made except in the cases specified in paragraphs (1) to (4) of subsection (g) of section 2.

(g) Any person who makes application for payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act.

CLAIMS OF AUSTRIAN AND HUNGARIAN NATIONALS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 6. (a) It shall be the duty of the arbiter, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, to hear the claims of any Austrian or Hungarian national (as hereinafter defined) and to determine the compensation to be paid by the United States, in respect of—

(1) Any patent (or any right therein or claim thereto, and including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian to the United States. Such compensation shall be the amount, as nearly as may be determined, which would have been paid if such patent, right, claim, or application had been licensed, assigned, or sold to the United States by a citizen of the United States, except that there shall be deducted from such amount any consideration paid therefor by the United States (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(2) The use by or for the United States of any invention described in and covered by any patent (including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was conveyed, transferred, or assigned to, or seized by, the Alien Property Custodian, but not including any use during any period between December 7, 1917, and November 3, 1918, both dates inclusive, or on or after the date on which such patent was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian. In determining such compensation, any defense, general or special, available to a defendant in an action for infringement or in any suit in equity for relief against an alleged infringement, shall be available to the United States.

(b) The proceedings of the arbiter under this section shall be conducted in accordance with such rules of procedure as he may prescribe. The arbiter, or any referee designated by him, is authorized to administer oaths, to hold hearings at such places within or without the United States as the arbiter deems necessary, and to contract for the reporting of such hearings. Any witness appearing for the United States before the arbiter or any such referee at any place within or without the United States may be paid the same fees and mileage as witnesses in courts of the United States. Such payments may be made in advance, and may be made in the first instance out of the German special deposit account, subject to reimbursement from the special deposit account (Austrian or Hungarian, as the case may be) hereinafter provided for.

(c) The arbiter shall, upon the determination by him of the fair compensation in respect of all such patents, make a tentative award to each claimant of the fair compensation to be paid in respect of his claim, including simple interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, on the amount of such compensation from July 2, 1921, to December 31, 1928, both dates inclusive.

(d) The total amount to be awarded under this section shall not exceed $1,000,000, minus the sum of (1) the expenditures in carrying out the provisions of this section (including a reasonable estimate for such expenditures to be incurred prior to the expiration of the term of office of the arbiter), and (2) the aggregate consideration paid by the United States in respect of the use, license, assignment, and sale of such patents (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(e) If the aggregate amount of the tentative awards exceeds the amount which may be awarded under subsection (d), the arbiter shall reduce pro rata the amount of each tentative award. The arbiter shall enter an award of the amount to be paid each claimant, and thereupon shall certify such awards to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay the amount of the awards certified under subsection (e), together with simple interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, beginning January 1, 1929, until paid.

(g) The payments authorized by subsection (f) shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the Hungarian special deposit account (Austrian or Hungarian, as the case may be), created by section 7, and within the limitations hereinafter prescribed.

(h) No payment shall be made under this section unless application therefor is made, within two years after the date the award is certified, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment of any amount in respect of any award may be made, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, either in the United States or in Austria or in Hungary, and either in money of the United States or in lawful Austrian or Hungarian money (as the case may be), and shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except in the cases specified in paragraphs (1) to (4) of subsection (k) of section 3.

(i) The provisions of subsections (l), (m), and (o) of section 3 shall be applicable in carrying out the provisions of this section, except that the expenditures in carrying out the provisions of section 3 and this section shall be allocated (as nearly as may be) by the arbiter and paid, in accordance with such allocation, out of the German special deposit account created by section 4 or the special deposit account (Austrian or Hungarian, as the case may be) created by section 7. Such payments may be made in the first instance out of the German special deposit account, subject to reimbursement from the Austrian or the Hungarian special deposit account in appropriate cases.

(j) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to remain available until expended, such amount, not in excess of $1,000,000, as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section.

(k) The provisions of this section shall constitute the exclusive method for the presentation and payment of claims arising out of any of the acts by or on behalf of the United States for which this section provides a remedy. Any person who files any claim or makes application for any payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act.

(l) If the aggregate amount to be awarded in respect of any patent is awarded in respect of two or more claims, such amount shall be apportioned among such claims by the arbiter as he determines to be just and equitable and as the interests of the claimants may appear.

AUSTRIAN AND HUNGARIAN SPECIAL DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

SEC. 7. (a) There is hereby created in the Treasury an Austrian special deposit account and an Hungarian special deposit account, into which, respectively, shall be deposited all funds hereinafter specified and from which, respectively, shall be disbursed all payments and expenditures authorized by section 5 or 6 or this section.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to deposit in the Austrian or the Hungarian special deposit account, as the case may be—

(1) The respective amounts appropriated under the authority of section 6 (patent claims of Austrian and Hungarian nationals);

(2) The respective sums transferred by the Alien Property Custodian, under the provisions of subsection (g) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (property of Austrian and Hungarian Governments);

(3) All money (including the proceeds of any property, rights, or benefits which may be sold or otherwise disposed of, upon such terms as he may prescribe) received, whether before or after the enactment of this act, by the United States in respect of claims of the United States against Austria or Hungary, as the case may be, on account of awards of the commissioner.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, out of the funds in the Austrian or the Hungarian special deposit account, as the case may be, subject to the provisions of subsections (d) and (e)—

(1) To make the payments of expenses of administration authorized by section 6 or this section;

(2) To make the payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 5 (relating to awards of the Tripartite Claims Commission); and

(3) To make the payments of the awards of the arbiter, together with interest thereon, as provided by section 6 (relating to claims of Austrian and Hungarian nationals).

(d) No payment shall be made in respect of any award of the commissioner against Austria or of the arbiter on behalf of an Austrian national, nor shall any money or other property be returned under paragraph (15), (17), (18), or (19) of subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the return of money and other property by the Alien Property Custodian to Austrian nationals), prior to the date upon which the commissioner certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury—

(1) That the amounts deposited in the Austrian special deposit account under paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of this section (in respect of property of the Austrian Government or property of a corporation all the stock of which was owned by the Austrian Government) and under paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section (in respect of money received by the United States in respect of claims of the United States against Austria on account of awards of the commissioner) are sufficient to make the payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 5 in respect of awards against Austria; and

(2) In respect of interlocutory judgments entered by the commissioner the rate of exchange at which such interlocutory judgments shall be converted into money of the United States, and the rate of interest applicable to such judgments and the period during which such interest shall run. The commissioner is authorized and requested to fix such rate of exchange and interest as he may determine to be fair and equitable, and to give notice thereof, within 30 days after the enactment of this act.

(e) No payment shall be made in respect of any award of the commissioner against Hungary or of the arbiter on behalf of an Hungarian national, nor shall any money or other property be returned under paragraph (15), (20), (21), or (22) of subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by this act (relating to the return of money and other property by the Alien Property Custodian to Hungarian nationals), prior to the date upon which the commissioner certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury—

(1) That the amounts deposited in the Hungarian special deposit account under paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of this section (in respect of property of the Hungarian Government or property of a corporation all the stock of which was owned by the Hungarian Government) and under paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section (in respect of money received by the United States in respect of claims of the United States against Hungary on account of awards of the commissioner), are sufficient to make the payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 5 in respect of awards against Hungary; and

(2) In respect of interlocutory judgments entered by the commissioner, the rate of exchange at which such interlocutory judgments shall be converted into money of the United States and the rate of interest applicable to such judgments and the period during which such interest shall run. The commissioner is authorized and requested to fix such rate of exchange and interest as he may determine to be fair and equitable, and to give notice thereof, within 30 days after the enactment of this act.

(f) Amounts available under subsection (e) of section 4 (relating to payment of expenses of administration) shall be available for the payment of expenses in carrying out the provisions of this section, including personal services at the seat of government.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest and reinvest, from time to time, in bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, any of the funds in the Austrian or the Hungarian special deposit account, and to deposit to the credit of such account the interest or other earnings thereon.

(h) There shall be deducted from the amounts first payable under this section to any American national in respect of any debt, the amount, if any, paid by the Alien Property Custodian in respect of such debt which was not credited by the commissioner in making his award.

(i) The payments of the awards of the commissioner to the United States, on its own behalf, on account of claims of the United States against Austria or Hungary, shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(j) Any amount remaining in the Austrian or the Hungarian special deposit account after all the payments authorized to be made therefrom have been completed, shall be disposed of as follows:

(1) There shall first be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts the respective amount, if any, by which the appropriations made under the authority of section 6 and deposited in such special deposit account exceed the payments authorized by such section; and

(2) The remainder shall be refunded to Austria or Hungary, as their respective interests may appear.

FINALITY OF DECISIONS

SEC. 8. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 236 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, the decisions of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect of the funds to be paid into the German, the Austrian, or the Hungarian special deposit account and of the payments therefrom, shall be final and conclusive, and shall not be subject to review by any other officer of the United States, except that payments made under authority of subsection (c) or (m) of section 3 or subsection (e) of section 4 or subsection (f) of section 7 (relating to expenses of administration) shall be accounted for and settled without regard to the provisions of this subsection.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report to the Congress, shall include a detailed statement of all expenditures made in carrying out the provisions of this act.

EXCESSIVE FEES PROHIBITED

SEC. 9. (a) The arbiter and the commissioner of the Mixed Claims Commission appointed by the United States and the commissioner of the Tripartite Claims Commission, respectively, are authorized and requested to fix reasonable fees in every case (whether or not fixed under any contract or agreement and whether or not there is any dispute in respect of the amount thereof) for services in connection with the proceedings before the arbiter and the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tripartite Claims Commission, respectively, and with the preparations therefor, and the application for payment, and the payment, of any amount under section 2, 3, 5, or 6.

(b) Any person accepting any consideration (whether or not under a contract or agreement entered into prior to the enactment of this act) prior to the date on which the fee is fixed under subsection (a) or the aggregate value of which is in excess of the amount so fixed, for services in connection with the proceedings before the arbiter or Mixed Claims Commission or Tripartite Claims Commission, or any preparations therefor, or with the application for payment, or the payment of, any amount under section 2, 3, 5, or 6 shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine equal to four times the aggregate value of the consideration accepted by such person therefor.

(c) Section 20 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the word "attorney" wherever it appears in such section the words "at law or in fact."

(d) Any person who violates subsection (b) of this section or section 20 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, whether or not convicted of such violation in any court of the United States, shall be ineligible to appear as an attorney at law before any department, agency, or officer of the United States in the executive branch of the Government. Such ineligibility shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the person or persons having authority to prescribe the qualifications for practice before such department, agency, or officer.

INVESTMENT OF FUNDS BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

SEC. 10. The trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new section:

"SEC. 25. (a) (1) The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to invest, from time to time upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the funds held by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States for the Alien Property Custodian, an amount not to exceed $40,000,000 in the aggregate, in one or more participating certificates issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(2) When in the case of any trust written consent under subsection (m) of section 9 has been filed, an amount equal to the portion of such trust the return of which is temporarily postponed under such subsection shall be credited against the investment made under paragraph (1) of this subsection. If the total amount so credited is in excess of the amount invested under paragraph (1) of this subsection, the excess shall be invested by the Alien Property Custodian in accordance with the provisions of this subsection, without regard to the $40,000,000 limitation in paragraph (1). If the amount invested under paragraph (1) of this subsection is in excess of the total amount so credited, such excess shall, from time to time on request of the Alien Property Custodian, be paid to him out of the funds in the German special deposit account created by section 4 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, and such payments shall have priority over any payments therefrom other than the payments under paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of such section (relating to expenses of administration).

"(b) The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to invest, in one or more participating certificates issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the unallocated interest fund, as defined in section 28—

"(1) The sum of $25,000,000. If, after the allocation under section 26 has been made, the amount of the unallocated interest fund allocated to the trusts described in subsection (c) of such section is found to be in excess of $25,000,000, such excess shall be invested by the Alien Property Custodian in accordance with the provisions of this subsection. If the amount so allocated is found to be less than $25,000,000 any participating certificate or certificates that have been issued shall be corrected accordingly; and

"(2) The balance of such unallocated interest fund remaining after the investment provided for in paragraph (1) and the payment of allocated earnings in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) of section 26 have been made.

"(c) If the amount of such unallocated interest fund, remaining after the investment required by paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of this section has been made, is insufficient to pay the allocated earnings in accordance with subsection (b) of section 26, then the amount necessary to make up the deficiency shall be paid out of the funds in the German special deposit account created by section 4 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, and such payment shall have priority over any payments therefrom other than the payments under paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of such section (relating to expenses of administration) and the payments under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of this section.

"(d) The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed (after the payment of debts under section 9) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury, for deposit in such special deposit account, all money and the proceeds of all property, including all income, dividends, interest, annuities, and earnings accumulated in respect thereof, owned by the German Government or any member of the former ruling family. All money and other property shall be held to be owned by the German Government (1) if no claim thereto has been filed with the Alien Property Custodian prior to the expiration of six months from the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, or (2) if any such claim has been filed within such period, then if the ownership thereof under any such claim is not established. The amounts so transferred under this subsection shall be credited upon the final payment due the United States from the German Government on account of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

"(e) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue to the Alien Property Custodian, upon such terms and conditions and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, one or more participating certificates, bearing interest payable annually (as nearly as may be) at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, as evidence of the investment by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (a), and one or more noninterest-bearing participating certificates as evidence of the investment by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (b). All such certificates shall evidence a participating interest, in accordance with, and subject to the priorities of, the provisions of section 4 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, in the funds in the German special deposit account created by such section, except that—

"(1) The United States shall assume no liability, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any such certificates, or of the interest thereon, except out of funds in such special deposit account available therefor, and all such certificates shall so state on their face; and

"(2) Such certificates shall not be transferable, except that the Alien Property Custodian may transfer any such participating certificate evidencing the interest of a substantial number of the owners of the money invested, to a trustee duly appointed by such owners.

"(f) Any amount of principal or interest paid to the Alien Property Custodian in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c) of section 4 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928 shall be allocated pro rata among the persons filing written consents under subsection (m) of section 9 of this act, and the amounts so allocated shall be paid to such persons. If any person to whom any amount is payable under this subsection has died (or if, in the case of a partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, its existence has terminated), payment shall be made to the persons determined by the Alien Property Custodian to be entitled thereto.

"(g) The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed (after the payment of debts under section 9) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury, for deposit in the special deposit account (Austrian or Hungarian, as the case may be), created by section 7 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, all money and the proceeds of all property, including all income, dividends, interest, annuities, and earnings accumulated in respect thereof, owned by the Austrian Government or any corporation all the stock of which was owned by or on behalf of the Austrian Government (including the property of the Imperial Royal Tobacco Monopoly, also known under the name of K. K. Oesterreichische Tabak Regie), or owned by the Hungarian Government or by any corporation all the stock of which was owned by or on behalf of the Hungarian Government."

RETURN TO NATIONALS OF GERMANY, AUSTRIA, AND HUNGARY OF PROPERTY HELD BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

SEC. 11. Subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by striking out the punctuation at the end of paragraph (11) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "or" and inserting after paragraph (11) the following new paragraphs:

"(12) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, and was entirely owned at such time by subjects or citizens of nations, states, or free cities other than Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary and is so owned at the time of the return of its money or other property, and has filed the written consent provided for in subsection (m); or

"(13) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, having its principal place of business at such time within any country other than Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, or a corporation organized or incorporated within any country other than Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed; or

"(14) An individual who at such time was a citizen or subject of Germany or who, at the time of the return of any money or other property, is a citizen or subject of Germany or is not a citizen or subject of any nation, state, or free city, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed; or

"(15) The Austro-Hungarian Bank, except that the money or other property thereof shall be returned only to the liquidators thereof; or

"(16) An individual, partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed, and that no suit or proceeding against the United States or any agency thereof is pending in respect of such return, and that such individual has filed a written waiver renouncing on behalf of himself, his heirs, successors, and assigns any claim based upon the fact that at the time of such return he was in fact entitled to such return under any other provision of this act; or

"(17) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, and was entirely owned at such time by citizens of Austria and is so owned at the time of the return of its money or other property; or

"(18) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, having its principal place of business at such time within Austria, or a corporation organized or incorporated within Austria; or

"(19) An individual who at such time was a citizen of Austria or who, at the time of the return of any money or other property, is a citizen of Austria; or

"(20) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, and was entirely owned at such time by citizens of Hungary and is so owned at the time of the return of its money or other property; or

"(21) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, having its principal place of business at such time within Hungary, or a corporation organized or incorporated within Hungary; or

"(22) An individual who at such time was a citizen of Hungary or who, at the time of the return of any money or other property, is a citizen of Hungary;—"

SEC. 12. (a) Subsection (d) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever an individual, deceased, would have been entitled, if living, to the return of any money or other property without filing the written consent provided for in subsection (m), then his legal representative may proceed for the return of such money or other property in the same manner as such individual might proceed if living, and such money or other property may be returned to such legal representative without requiring the appointment of an administrator, or an ancillary administrator, by a court in the United States, or to any such ancillary administrator, for distribution directly to the persons entitled thereto. Return in accordance with the provisions of this subsection may be made in any case where an application or court proceeding by any legal representative, under the provisions of this subsection before its amendment by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, is pending and undetermined at the time of the enactment of such act. All bonds or other security given under the provisions of this subsection before such amendment shall be canceled or released and all sureties thereon discharged."

(b) Subsection (e) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a semicolon and the following: "nor shall a debt be allowed under this section unless notice of the claim has been filed, or application therefor has been made, prior to the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928."

(c) Subsection (g) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(g) Whenever an individual, deceased, would have been entitled, if living, to the return of any money or other property upon filing the written consent provided for in subsection (m), then his legal representative may proceed for the return of such money or other property in the same manner as such individual might proceed if living, and such money or other property may be returned, upon filing the written consent provided for in subsection (m), to such legal representative without requiring the appointment of an administrator, or an ancillary administrator, by a court in the United States, or to any such ancillary administrator, for distribution to the persons entitled thereto. This subsection shall not be construed as extinguishing or diminishing any right which any citizen of the United States may have had under this subsection prior to its amendment by the settlement of war claims act of 1928 to receive in full his interest in the property of any individual dying before such amendment."

SEC. 13. Subsections (j) and (k) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, are amended so as to compare three subsections, to read as follows:

"(j) The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to return to the person entitled thereto, whether or not an enemy or ally of enemy and regardless of the value, any patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, which was conveyed, transferred, assigned, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, and which has not been sold, licensed, or otherwise disposed of under the provisions of this act, and to return any such patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, which has been licensed, except that any patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, which is returned by the Alien Property Custodian and which has been licensed, or in respect of which any contract has been entered into, or which is subject to any lien or encumbrance, shall be returned subject to the license, contract, lien, or encumbrance.

"(k) Except as provided in section 27, paragraphs (12) to (22), both inclusive, of subsection (b) of this section shall apply to the proceeds received from the sale, license, or other disposition of any patent, trade-mark, print, label, copyright, or right therein or claim thereto, conveyed, transferred, assigned, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him.

"(l) This section shall apply to royalties paid to the Alien Property Custodian, in accordance with a judgment or decree in a suit brought under subsection (f) of section 10; but shall not apply to any other money paid to the Alien Property Custodian under section 10."

SEC. 14. Section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(m) No money or other property shall be returned under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) or under subsection (g) or (n), unless the person entitled thereto files a written consent to a postponement of the return of an amount equal to 20 per cent of the aggregate value of such money or other property (at the time, as nearly as may be, of the return), as determined by the Alien Property Custodian, and the investment of such amount in accordance with the provisions of section 25. Such amount shall be deducted from the money to be returned to such person, so far as possible, and the balance shall be deducted from the proceeds of the sale of so much of the property as may be necessary, unless such person pays the balance to the Alien Property Custodian, except that no property shall be so sold prior to the expiration of six years from the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928 without the consent of the person entitled thereto. The amounts so deducted shall be returned to the persons entitled thereto as provided in subsection (f) of section 25. The sale of any such property shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 12, except that the provisions of such section relating to sales or resales to, or for the benefit of, citizens of the United States shall not be applicable.

"(n) In the case of property consisting of stock or other interest in any corporation, association, company, or trust, or of bonded or other indebtedness thereof, evidenced by certificates of stock or by bonds or by other certificates of interest therein or indebtedness thereof, or consisting of dividends or interest or other accruals thereon, where the right, title, and interest in the property (but not the actual certificate or bond or other certificate of interest or indebtedness) was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, if the President determines that the owner thereof or of any interest therein has acquired such ownership by assignment, transfer, or sale of such certificate or bond or other certificate of interest or indebtedness (it being the intent of this subsection that such assignment, transfer, or sale shall not be deemed invalid hereunder by reason of such conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to the Alien Property Custodian or seizure by him), and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed, then the President may make in respect of such property an order of the same character, upon the same conditions, and with the same effect, as in cases provided for in subsection (b), including the benefits of subsection (c).

"(o) The provisions of paragraph (12), (13), (14), (17), (18), (19), (20), (21), or (22) of subsection (b), or of subsection (m) or (n) of this section, and (except to the extent therein provided) the provisions of paragraph (16) of subsection (b), shall not be construed as diminishing or extinguishing any right under any other provision of this act in force immediately prior to the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928.

"(p) The Alien Property Custodian shall transfer the money or other property in the trust of any partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, the existence of which has terminated, to trusts in the names of the persons (including the German Government and members of the former ruling family) who have succeeded to its claim or interest; and the provisions of subsection (a) of this section relating to the collection of a debt (by order of the President or of a court) out of money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States shall be applicable to the debts of such successor and any such debt may be collected out of the money or other property in any of such trusts if not returnable under subsection (a) of this section.

"(q) The return of money or other property under paragraph (15), (17), (18), (19), (20), (21), or (22) of subsection (b) (relating to the return to Austrian and Hungarian nationals) shall be subject to the limitations imposed by subsections (d) and (e) of section 7 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928."

SEC. 15. The trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new sections:

"SEC. 26. (a) The Alien Property Custodian shall allocate among the various trusts the funds in the 'unallocated interest fund' (as defined in section 28). Such allocation shall be made by the Alien Property Custodian and shall be based upon the average rate of earnings (determined by the Secretary of the Treasury) on the total amounts deposited under section 12.

"(b) The Alien Property Custodian, when the allocation has been made, is authorized and directed to pay to persons entitled, in accordance with a final decision of a court of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or of an opinion of the Attorney General, to the distribution of any portion of such unallocated interest fund, the amount allocated to his trust, except as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

"(c) In the case of persons entitled, under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) of section 9, to such return, and in the case of persons who would be entitled to such return thereunder if all such money or property had not been returned under paragraph (9) or (10) of such subsection, and in the case of persons entitled to such return under subsection (n) of section 9, an amount equal to the aggregate amount allocated to their trusts shall be credited against the sum of $25,000,000 invested in participating certificates under paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 25. If the aggregate amount so allocated is in excess of $25,000,000, an amount equal to the excess shall be invested in the same manner. Upon the repayment of any of the amounts so invested, under the provisions of section 4 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, the amount so repaid shall be distributed pro rata among such persons, notwithstanding any receipts or releases given by them.

"(d) The unallocated interest fund shall be available for carrying out the provisions of this section, including the expenses of making the allocation.

"SEC. 27. The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to return to the United States any consideration paid to him by the United States under any license, assignment, or sale by the Alien Property Custodian to the United States of any patent (or any right therein or claim thereto, and including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application).

"SEC. 28. As used in this act, the term 'unallocated interest fund' means the sum of (1) the earnings and profits accumulated prior to March 4, 1923, and attributable to investments and reinvestments under section 12 by the Secretary of the Treasury, plus (2) the earnings and profits accumulated on or after March 4, 1923, in respect of the earnings and profits referred to in clause (1) of this section.

"SEC. 29. (a) Where the Alien Property Custodian has made demand or requirement for the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to him of any money or other property of any enemy or ally of enemy (whether or not suit or proceeding for the enforcement thereof has been begun and whether or not any judgment or decree in respect thereof has been made or entered) and where the whole or any part of such money or other property would, if conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to him, be returnable under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) of section 9, the Alien Property Custodian may, in his discretion, and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, waive such demand or requirement, or accept in full satisfaction of such demand, requirement, judgment, or decree, a less amount than that demanded or required by him.

"(b) The Alien Property Custodian shall make any such waiver or compromise only with the approval of the Attorney General; and then only if, after compliance with the terms and conditions of such waiver or compromise, the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States will hold (in respect of such enemy or ally of enemy) for investment as provided in section 25 an amount equal to 20 per cent of the sum of (1) the value of the money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States at the time of such waiver or compromise, plus (2) the value of the money or other property to which the Alien Property Custodian would be entitled under such demand or requirement if the waiver or compromise had not been made.

"(c) Where the Alien Property Custodian has made demand or requirement for the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to him of any money or other property of any enemy or ally of enemy (whether or not suit or proceeding for the enforcement thereof has been begun and whether or not any judgment or decree in respect thereof has been made or entered) and where the whole or any part of such money or other property would, if conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to him, be returnable under paragraph (15), (17), (18), (19), (20), (21), or (22) of subsection (b) of section 9, the Alien Property Custodian may, in his discretion, and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, waive such demand and requirement, but only with the approval of the Attorney General.

"(d) Nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring the Alien Property Custodian to make any waiver or compromise authorized by this section, and the Alien Property Custodian may proceed in respect of any demand or requirement referred to in subsection (a) or (c) as if this section had not been enacted.

"SEC. 30. Any money or other property returnable under subsection (b) or (n) of section 9 shall, at any time prior to such return, be subject to attachment in accordance with the provisions of the code of law for the District of Columbia, as amended, relating to attachments in suits at law, but any writ of attachment or garnishment issuing in any such suit shall be served only upon the Alien Property Custodian, who shall for the purposes of such suit be considered as holding credits in favor of the person entitled to such return to the extent of the value of the money or other property so returnable.

"SEC. 31. As used in this act, the term 'member of the former ruling family' means (1) any person who was at any time between April 6, 1917, and July 2, 1921, the German Emperor or the ruler of any constituent State of the German Empire, or (2) the wife or any child of such person."

SEC. 16. Section 22 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 22. No person shall be entitled to the return of any property or money under any provision of this act, or any amendment of this act, who is a fugitive from justice of the United States or any State or Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia."

RETURN OF INCOME

SEC. 17. Section 23 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. The Alien Property Custodian is directed to pay to the person entitled thereto, from and after March 4, 1923, the net income (including dividends, interest, annuities, and other earnings), accruing and collected thereafter, in respect of any money or property held in trust for such person by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States for the account of the Alien Property Custodian, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

TAXES

SEC. 18. Section 24 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by inserting "(a)" after the section number and by adding at the end of such section new subsections to read as follows:

"(b) In the case of income, war-profits, excess-profits, or estate taxes imposed by any act of Congress, the amount thereof shall, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be computed in the same manner (except as hereinafter in this section provided) as though the money or other property had not been seized by or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, and shall be paid, as far as practicable, in accordance with subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) So much of the net income of a taxpayer for the taxable year 1917, or any succeeding taxable year, as represents the gain derived from the sale or exchange by the Alien Property Custodian of any property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to him, or seized by him, may at the option of the taxpayer be segregated from the net income and separately taxed at the rate of 12½ per cent. This subsection shall be applied and the amount of net income to be so segregated shall be determined, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as nearly as may be in the same manner as provided in section 208 of the revenue act of 1926 (relating to capital net gains), but without regard to the period for which the property was held by the Alien Property Custodian before its sale or exchange.

"(d) Any property sold or exchanged by the Alien Property Custodian (whether before or after the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928) shall be considered as having been compulsorily or involuntarily converted, within the meaning of the income, excess-profits, and war-profits tax laws and regulations; and the provisions of such laws and regulations relating to such a conversion shall (under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) apply in the case of the proceeds of such sale or exchange. For such purpose the date of the return of the proceeds to the person entitled thereto shall be considered as the date of the conversion.

"(e) In case of any internal-revenue tax imposed in respect of property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, and imposed in respect of any period (in the taxable year 1917 or any succeeding taxable year) during which such property was held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, no interest or civil penalty shall be assessed upon, collected from, or paid by or on behalf of the taxpayer; nor shall any interest be credited or paid to the taxpayer in respect of any credit or refund allowed or made in respect of such tax.

"(f) Any period of limitation for the making of a claim for credit or refund, for the making of an assessment, or for the beginning of distraint or proceeding in court for the collection or any internal-revenue tax (imposed in respect of property conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, and imposed in respect of any period, in the taxable year 1917 or any succeeding taxable year, during which such property was held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States) which has expired or which may expire before the expiration of six months from the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, is extended until the expiration of such six months' period."

SHIP CLAIMS OF FORMER GERMAN NATIONALS

SEC. 19. (a) It shall be the duty of the arbiter to hear the claims of any partnership, association, joint-stock company, or corporation, and to determine the amount of compensation to be paid to it by the United States, in respect of the merchant vessels Carl Diederichsen and Johanne (including any equipment, appurtenances, and property contained therein), title to which was taken by or on behalf of the United States under the authority of the joint resolution of May 12, 1917, and which were subsequently sold by or on behalf of the United States. Such compensation shall be determined as provided in paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 3 of this act, but the aggregate compensation shall not exceed, in the case of the Carl Diederichsen, $166,787.78, and in the case of the Johanne $174,600, such amounts being the price for which the vessels were sold, less, in the case of the Carl Diederichsen, the cost of reconditioning. The arbiter shall not make any award under this section in respect of the claim of any partnership, association, joint-stock company, or corporation unless it appears to his satisfaction that all its members and stockholders who were, on April 6, 1917, citizens or subjects of Germany, became, by virtue of any treaty of peace or plebiscite held or further treaty concluded under such treaty of peace, and are on the date of the enactment of this act citizens or subjects of any nation other than Germany.

(b) Upon the determination by him of such compensation the arbiter shall enter an award in favor of such person of the amount of such compensation and shall certify such award to the Secretary of the Treasury. The amount of such award, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from July 2, 1921, until the date of such payment, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe. There is authorized to be appropriated such amount as may be necessary to make such payment.

(c) No payment shall be made in respect of any award under this section unless application therefor is made within two years after the date such award is certified, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and payment shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except in the cases specified in paragraphs (1) to (4) of subsection (k) of section 3. The provisions of subsections (c), (l), (m), (o), and (r) of section 3 shall be applicable in carrying out the provisions of this section.

(d) The provisions of this section shall constitute the exclusive method for the presentation and payment of claims arising out of any of the acts by or on behalf of the United States for which this section provides a remedy. Any person who files any claim or makes application for any payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act. This subsection shall not bar the presentation of a claim under section 3 (relating to the ship claims of German nationals) in respect of the taking of the vessel Carl Diederichsen or the vessel Johanne; but no award shall be made under section 3 in respect of either of such vessels to or on behalf of any person to whom or on whose behalf an award is made under this section in respect of such vessel.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, with reference to the pending bill, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Carl Buche, of Glenwood, Fla.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

GLENWOOD, FLA., February 14, 1928.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have filed claims with the Department of State and the Alien Property Custodian under the treaties between the United States and Germany, as well as our Federal laws.

Before the outbreak of the World War, American citizens acquired German securities, payable in gold marks, to the equivalent of at least $67,000,000, which were left in Germany by the owners thereof so that they could be readily disposed of in case of need. See Senate Document 419, Sixty-sixth Congress, pages 8 and 9, transmitted by President Harding to the Senate, which verifies the fact regarding the amount of American-owned securities in Germany during the war period.

Soon after we declared war against Germany it seized American-owned securities and prevented their sale or removal. Laws enacted by Germany were known as "Measures of economic retaliation against the United States," and they were not repealed until January 10, 1920. See report of German Alien Property Custodian published February 21, 1921, in the Congressional Library, which confirms the fact about the seizure of the bonds.

When these bonds were bought marks were valued at about 24 cents and when they were released marks were valued at 2 cents. Those who issued the bonds got full value and converted the proceeds to their benefit and use.

When the Foreign Relations Committee considered and reported the Knox-Porter resolution in 1921 terminating the state of war, it gave American citizens the right to recover their losses from Germany. Section 5 of that resolution referred to securities issued by German corporations, and Senator Lodge stated on the floor of the Senate, "The resolution was general in terms, elaborate in regard to the protection of claims of citizens of the United States."

Section 5 of the Knox-Porter resolution was incorporated in the treaty of Berlin, and again Senator Lodge referred to the protection accorded the claims of American citizens when he stated on the floor of the Senate September 24, 1921, "We are not limited by the Versailles treaty as to the character of claims for damages; we can make any claims we like."

A short time before the Knox-Porter resolution was enacted, President Harding transmitted to the Senate information about the character and total amount of claims filed against Germany. The total was $191,000,000, of which $67,000,000 represented claims based upon the seizure of securities.

In 1923 the Mixed Claims Commission commenced to function, and in 1925 it ruled that unless the securities fell due during the war period or the American owner during the war made an effort to sell or exchange them no recovery could be had. The ruling of the commission conflicts with the report made by Senator Lodge to the Senate, because, as Senator Lodge stated: "The resolution was general in terms, elaborate in regard to the protection of claims of citizens of the United States." The commission has made it impossible by its decisions for American citizens whose claims made up the largest single category of losses to recover the same.

One of the categories of damages that made up the $191,000,000 of claims was $30,000,000 representing American-owned deposits of marks in German banks, which had also been seized by Germany exactly as the securities had. These bank deposits were credited chiefly to certain big New York banking interests.

The bank deposits never fell due, and for the purpose of recovering the losses for these New York bankers the American agent and the German agent associated with the Mixed Claims Commission entered into a stipulation in which the representatives of the bankers participated whereby they were to receive 16 cents per mark even though, as stated, the mark bank deposits did not mature during the war period.

According to page 136 of the hearings held by the Committee on Finance on January 13, 1927, relative to the alien property bill, Mr. Bonynge, the American agent, said:

"It was a very important settlement, particularly for our bank deposits, because, as you notice from reading the character of debts specified in the treaty, it would have been necessary to establish that the debt matured during the war. Now, a bank deposit ordinarily does not mature until a demand is made for the bank deposit. We would have great difficulty in establishing as a debt that the bank deposit has matured during the war. But under this agreement all bank balances were to be valorized at this same rate of 16 cents to the mark. And all that we had to establish was the amount of the bank balance as it existed on April 6, 1917."

Here we have one politically intrenched and favored class of claimants getting their claims allowed when their debts had not matured, compared to another class of claimants without political power being ruled out because their bonds had not matured.

These very same New York banking interests were keenly interested in the sale of German dollar bonds since the signing of the armistice because of the handsome commissions involved, and they were undoubtedly desirous of freeing Germany and its nationals from prior liens existing by reason of the old gold-mark bonds.

In 1926 ex-Secretary of State Hughes was retained by Zimmermann & Forshay Assets Corporation. They were the largest pre-war dealers in German securities, and their particular interests in the matter is caused by virtue of the fact that the equivalent of about $5,000,000 of their customers' bonds in Germany had been seized and withheld until the mark became worthless.

Mr. Hughes argued his client's case before the United States Supreme Court, and it was predicated upon the provisions of the treaty of Berlin as well as the provisions of subsection E of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, which specifically provided that any debt owing before October 6, 1917, to American citizens should be paid out of his particular German debtor's property in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian. For instance, if A, a German national, had property which had been taken over by the Alien Property Custodian and owed B a debt which was contracted prior to October 6, 1917, then B was entitled to repayment of the loan out of A's property in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian.

The Supreme Court held by a decision of 5 to 4 that the date the debt fell due should determine the rate of exchange. This permitted practically all German debtors to escape the repayment of their bonds.

I submit that it is most unusual for a former Secretary of State to go before the United States Supreme Court and interpret a treaty which he negotiated. Mr. Hughes contended that the debt had to be merely owing and contracted prior to October 6, 1917, the date our trading with the enemy act became effective, and that we were entitled to the dollar rate of exchange existing just before we declared war against Germany, and all that the American citizen had to prove was that the debt was owing to him before that date.

Here we have a situation where the Secretary of State who negotiated a treaty and four Justices of the United States Supreme Court agreeing with him that the treaty of Berlin, taken together with certain provisions of the trading with the enemy act, does not permit of a German debtor to repay his loans owing to American citizens after the currency had become absolutely worthless.

The remedy that these American creditors seek is that Germany and its nationals be compelled to observe their treaty obligations and that the American agent and the German agent of the Mixed Claims Commission not be permitted to formulate the foreign policy of the United States in the matter of discriminating between one class of citizens who can recover debts that are not due and another class who can not recover their loans because they are not due.

As a solution of this matter, I believe that an amendment should be put in the alien property bill. That bill now carries a provision, passed by the House, which allows the proceeds of repudiated German bonds sold by the German Government to American citizens to be used to pay the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission. This results in taking the property of American citizens and handing it over to Germany because it is credited to that Government in the matter of payment of reparations. Here we have a case where money loaned by an American citizen before the war is not returned to the lender but is by express act of the House of Representatives handed over to Germany unconditionally for use in discharging its obligations.

On April 1, 1923, the Hamburg-American Line and the North German Lloyd Line called for payment their entire funded debt, aggregating 93,000,000 marks. See New York Times May 10, 1923. The proceeds of the sale of the bonds issued before the war were used for the building of vessels. American citizens owned some of these bonds which were seized by the German Government. When these bonds were called in shortly after Germany released American-owned bonds, $5 would buy more than a million marks compared to $238,000 being required to buy a million marks before the war.

So we have the case of these two steamship lines paying their bondholders less than $500 for property which represented a material value of about $23,000,000. In order to disclose to you the outrageous treatment accorded American citizens compared to the generous provisions of the alien property bill in behalf of compensating German shipowners, there is to be inflicted upon the American taxpayer $100,000,000 as representing the fair value of German ships as of the date we took them over, but the American owner of steamship bonds bought before the war is robbed of his investment and can not obtain the fair value of his bonds as of the date Germany seized them.

Respectfully yours,

CARL BUCHE.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we have spent three hours to-day in the discussion of other matters, and the bill has not been considered at all. If I were to yield further, I do not know how many other requests of the kind would be made. I should like to have the bill passed to-night, if possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute; but amendments to the House text which is proposed to be stricken out, as well as amendments to the new language, are in order.

those to the House text taking precedence. The parliamentarian suggests that detail amendments should be offered first, because taking a vote upon the committee amendment will foreclose amendments to the proposed substitute.

The Chair merely calls the attention of the Senate to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall offer whatever amendments I offer to the Senate committee amendment, and I think all of the amendments will be offered in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are all in order, the Chair thinks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill as I reported it to the Senate was prepared hurriedly, and the committee understood that certain language and certain amendments would be left to the members of the drafting board. There are four amendments by way of perfection of provisions of the bill as reported by the Senate that I desire to offer now to the Senate provision of the bill. I send the first one to the desk, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 88, line 14, at the end of the line, it is proposed to insert a new sentence to read as follows:

If such aggregate value of the money or other property to be returned under paragraphs (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) or under subsection (g) is less than $2,000, then the written consent shall not be required and the money or other property shall be returned in full without the temporary retention and investment of 20 per cent thereof.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I take it that that amendment merely relates to minor claims.

Mr. SMOOT. Minor claims; to wind them up so that there will be no delay; and it will save a great deal of expense to the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. KING. The amount involved is only a few thousand dollars, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Forty-two thousand dollars.

Mr. KING. And the cost of administration would exceed, or at least approximate, the amount involved?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 90, at the end of line 9, it is proposed to insert the following:

Subject to the above provisions as to the collection of debts, each such successor (except the German Government and members of the former ruling family) may proceed for the return of the amount so transferred to his trust, in the same manner as such partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation might proceed if still in existence. If such partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation would have been entitled to the return of its money or other property only upon filing the written consent provided for in subsection (m), then the successor shall be entitled to the return under this subsection only upon filing such written consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill as reported directs the Alien Property Custodian to split up the property of any partnership, association, or corporation which has ceased to exist and to transfer such property to trusts in the names of the successors. In order that there may be no doubt as to the right of these successors to obtain the return of property to which they have thus become entitled, the amendment offered adds to subsection (p), on page 90, express provisions covering such return.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Also, on page 87, line 18, before the comma, it is proposed to insert:

or (to the extent therein provided) under subsection (p).

Mr. KING. I ask to have the context read. It is to carry out the former amendment, I know, but I want it to appear in the RECORD in proper chronological order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the text of the bill as it will read if amended.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

No money or other property shall be returned under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) or under subsection (g) or (n), or (to the extent therein provided) under subsection (p), unless the person entitled—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment, which is merely to correct a clerical error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 91, line 3, strike out the word "persons" and insert the words "each person."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 93, line 4, strike out all after the word "under," through the figure "9," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the words "any provision of this act"; strike out lines 11 and 12 and on line 13, through the word "if," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) The Alien Property Custodian shall not make any such waiver or compromise except with the approval of the Attorney General; nor (if any part of such money or property would be returnable only upon the filing of the written consent required by subsection (m) of section 9) unless.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move the following amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 94, strike out lines 1 to 15, inclusive, as follows:

(c) Where the Alien Property Custodian has made demand or requirement for the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to him of any money or other property of any enemy or ally of enemy (whether or not suit or proceeding for the enforcement thereof has been begun and whether or not any judgment or decree in respect thereof has been made or entered) and where the whole or any part of such money or other property would, if conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to him, be returnable under paragraph (15), (17), (18), (19), (20), (21), or (22) of subsection (b) of section 9, the Alien Property Custodian may, in his discretion, and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, waive such demand and requirement, but only with the approval of the Attorney General.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What would be the effect of that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill as reported by the committee authorizes waiver or compromise by the Alien Property Custodian, with the approval of the Attorney General, of all demands for delivery of enemy property, if such property would be returnable subject to the retention of 20 per cent. This power can not be exercised unless as a result of its exercise the Alien Property Custodian will have in his hands 20 per cent of the German's property for investment in the special deposit account. Neither the present law nor the bill expressly authorizes waivers or compromises in cases where the property, if obtained under the demand, would be returnable in full to the owner, except in the case of the property of Austrians and Hungarians. There seems no reason why the Alien Property Custodian should obtain possession of the property only to return it immediately to the owner. The amendment suggested, therefore, authorizes the Alien Property Custodian, with the approval of the Attorney General, to make waiver and compromise in all cases, but retains the provision of the bill as reported whereby the waiver or compromise can not be made in the case of German property, unless as a result 20 per cent of the property will be retained for investment in the special deposit account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 94, after line 21, insert a new subsection, as follows:

(e) All money or other property received by the Alien Property Custodian as a result of any action or proceeding (whether begun before or after the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, and whether or not for the enforcement of a demand or requirement as above specified) shall for the purposes of this act be considered as forming a part of the trust in respect of which such action or proceeding was brought, and shall be subject to return in the same manner and upon the same conditions as any other money or property in such trust, except as otherwise provided in subsection (b) of this section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in explanation of the amendment, I will say that a number of suits have been brought, and others are in contemplation, by the Alien Property Custodian on claims arising out of the disposition of property seized, the conduct of seized businesses, and so forth. These suits are to be distinguished from suits for the enforcement of a demand by the Alien Property Custodian for the transfer of property to him in the first instance and are not covered under section 29, added by the bill to the trading with the enemy act. There is in the existing law no specific direction to the Alien Property Custodian covering the disposition of sums received as a result of proceedings of this kind. This amendment provides that all money so recovered shall be turned into the trust of the person from whom was seized the property which formed the subject of the transaction out of which the suit arose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 97, line 22, strike out all after the period and through line 24 and insert:

For the purpose of determining whether the proceeds of such conversion have been expended within such time as will entitle the taxpayer to the benefits of such laws and regulations relating to such conversion, the date of the return of the proceeds to the person entitled thereto shall be considered as the date of the conversion.

Mr. SMOOT. The explanation of the amendment is as follows: Subsection (d), to which this amendment relates, extends to persons whose property is held by the Alien Property Custodian the benefits of the "involuntary conversion" features of the tax laws, under which gain is not recognized if the proceeds of the property involuntarily converted into cash are immediately invested in similar property or in a replacement fund. The last sentence on page 97, for which the proposed amendment is a substitute, provides that the date of the return of the proceeds shall be considered as the date of the conversion. The sentence was not intended to do more than fix this date for the purpose of determining the promptness of making the investment required to obtain the benefits of the provision. The amendment is to make clear this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 102, after line 22, insert:

SEC. 21. (a) Section 1303 (d) of the revenue act of 1918, as amended by section 1101 of the revenue act of 1924, is amended by adding at the end thereof a sentence to read as follows: "Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, the compensation of each of the two legislative counsel in office upon the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928 shall, after such date, be at the rate of $10,000 a year."

(b) The salary of the Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury in matters of legislation, so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, shall be at the rate of $10,000 a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the purpose of fixing salaries in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is anyone in the Government service who gives so much time to such difficult questions and is called upon for so many hours work as the parties involved in this.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Who are the parties involved?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Beaman, Mr. Alvord, and Mr. Lee. They are of the drafting board.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are all the amendments I have to offer.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 44, strike out lines 14 to 24, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 3. (a) There shall be a war claims arbiter (hereinafter referred to as the "arbiter") who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, without regard to any provision of law prohibiting the holding of more than one office. The arbiter, notwithstanding any other provision of law, shall receive a salary to be fixed by the President in an amount, if any, which if added to any other salary will make his total salary from the United States not in excess of $15,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we ought to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator starts on his explanation, I want to introduce a resolution touching the subject matter under consideration now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the presentation of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the resolution of the Senator from Alabama relate to this amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is a resolution relating to the bill now pending.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has no relation to the amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. It relates to the subject matter of the bill now being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from Alabama desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 151) was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate at the earliest date consistent with the best interests of the public service the following information for the benefit of the Senate in the consideration of H. R. 7201, first session, Seventieth Congress:

1. The names of any former officer, employee, or attorney, either regularly employed or special, of the Alien Property Custodian's bureau who, after such service, resigned or was dropped and who has later appeared as attorney before said Alien Property Custodian or the Department of Justice in the prosecution of claims for the release of property or for any other person claiming from the United States.

2. The dates of the separation of such persons aforenamed from the service and dates of the appearances as attorney for claimants and the titles of the claims for which they appeared.

3. Whether such former officers, employees, or attorneys were required on receiving releases for clients to execute the required affidavits, under the Winslow Act, as to fees contracted for or to be received.

4. A complete list of claims for property which was released in which the claimants were represented as attorneys by former officers, employees, or attorneys of the Alien Property Custodian.

5. State whether there is any rule or rules regulating practice of attorneys before the Alien Property Custodian's office which forbids the appearance before that bureau of former officers, attorneys, or employees of said bureau within a given date after their separation from the service.

6. Inform the Senate whether it is within the knowledge of the custodian that former officers, attorneys, or employees of that bureau have entered into contracts with former alien enemies upon contingent-fee contracts or otherwise, to obtain through legislation the release of all such property, and also whether any officers, attorneys, or employees of the Alien Property Custodian's office have resigned from office to associate themselves with holders of such contracts in the prosecution of such claims.

7. Also whether any present officer of the Federal Government or former officer of the Federal Government is or has been actively engaged in promoting the passage of H. R. 7201.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the important change in the phraseology involved in the amendment which I have just offered relates to the question of the approval by the Senate of the appointee of the President. I have no doubt the President will appoint a suitable arbiter, and yet the position is a very important one. Upon that official will devolve the responsibility of passing upon claims or controversies involving millions and millions of dollars, and it occurred to me that the appointee of the President should be confirmed by the Senate. The change is to make the appointment of the arbiter subject to the approval of the Senate. I think there can be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see no reason why the amendment should not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I submit the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 52, strike out lines 7 to 22, inclusive, and insert:

(1) There shall be a war claims counsel (hereinafter referred to as the "counsel"), who shall represent the United States in all proceedings before the arbiter. Such counsel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at a salary to be fixed by the President not in excess of $10,000 a year. The head of any executive department, independent establishment, or agency in the executive branch of the Government, including the Alien Property Custodian and the Comptroller General, shall, upon request of the arbiter or of the counsel, furnish such records, documents, papers, correspondence, and information in the possession of such department, independent establishment, or agency as may assist the arbiter or the counsel, furnish them statements and assistance of the same character as is described in section 188 of the Revised Statutes, and may temporarily detail any officers or employees of such department, independent establishment, or agency to assist the arbiter or the counsel, or to act as a referee, in carrying out the provisions of this section. The Attorney General shall assign such officers and employees of the Department of Justice as may be necessary to assist the counsel in representing the United States in the proceedings under this section.

On page 53, line 3, strike out the words "salary of the arbiter" and insert the words "salaries of the arbiter and of the war claims counsel"; on page 53, line 12, after the word "arbiter," insert a comma and the words "the counsel," and a comma, and on page 53, line 23, after the second comma, insert the words "of the counsel" and a comma.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 79, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "noninterest-bearing participating certificates" and insert in lieu thereof "participating certificates bearing simple interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amendment is one of considerable importance. However, the apparent lack of interest upon the part of Senators manifested in this important bill indicates that no amendment which will be offered will command much attention.

Briefly explaining the amendment and its relation to the bill before us, let me say that there has been accumulated in the Treasury of the United States, interest derived from the funds which were sequestered and are in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, a sum of approximately $25,000,000. Much of the property which has been sequestered has been converted into Government bonds, upon which of course interest is paid. This accumulated interest aggregates the amount which I have just indicated. Under the provisions of the House bill, the entire amount goes into a fund out of which payments are to be made to American claimants. It is to constitute a part of the funds. The bill as passed by the House—and that view has been taken by the Senate Committee on Finance—does not permit interest upon this interest which is to be paid ultimately to the German nationals when it shall be returned to them at the end of perhaps 20 or 25 years. There is an element of confiscation in the bill, if no provision is made for the payment of interest, even though it be interest upon interest, at the expiration of the period to which I have referred.

It is argued that there was no obligation upon the part of the Government to take the funds which were sequestered and invest them so that there would be an accumulation of profits or interest; but it seems to me there was a moral obligation, if not a legal one, upon the United States to care for the funds sequestered by it, and to conserve them and handle them as a reasonably prudent man and as a trustee would handle funds coming into his possession.

I make no comment upon the conduct of the Alien Property Custodian in caring for the funds. Suffice it to say that there has been accumulated the $25,000,000 to which I have adverted. In order to raise a sufficient fund by which the plan or the set-up, as it has been characterized, shall be carried into effect, it becomes necessary to resort to the $25,000,000 of interest and place it in a fund which, with other contributions to the fund, will enable the United States to pay to American nationals a certain percentage of the awards made.

The Finance Committee felt that the Government ought not to pay interest upon the interest. They have placed the $25,000,000, which has been secured or which has resulted from interest, in the tenth category, as I recall; that is to say, priorities are allowed in payments, and this $25,000,000 is to be paid to those from whose property it was derived, after nine priorities have been liquidated. At the end of that time or at the expiration of the period of the liquidation of the priorities antecedent to this, perhaps 25 years will have elapsed, so that at the end of that period those persons who have an interest in the $25,000,000 fund will receive their pro rata share. In the meantime they obtain certificates indicating their interest in the fund, but the certificates bear no interest. They are nonnegotiable. As a matter of fact, they will have but little value.

I have believed that if the owners of this interest fund are to wait for 25 years before receiving it they should receive interest upon the fund, though it be called interest upon interest. My amendment will accomplish that purpose. Of course, the accumulated interest, through it is simple interest and not compound, would make the amount to be paid considerably more than the $25,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What effect, if any, has the Senator's amendment on the general scheme of the bill for the payment of the various sums contemplated?

Mr. KING. As I interpret the amendment it would have no appreciable effect upon the "set-up," as it is called, in the bill. It would, however, have some effect upon the time when the Government of the United States would receive payment from Germany. Mr. President, the measure before us has many imperfections. It is not satisfactory to me and does not command my entire assent. It is essentially a compromise measure; sacrifices were made both by the Government of the United States and American nationals, as well as by German nationals in order to reach an agreement. While the measure before us is a legislative declaration, it is not inaccurate to say that it is a ratification of understandings and agreements entered into between German nationals who have property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and the United States, and American citizens who have claims against Germany and German nationals. The measure can not be defended upon academic grounds or upon strict principles of municipal or international law. However, after years of negotiation and consideration, the bill before us substantially represents the views and desires of those primarily interested in the matters covered by the pending measure.

After the United States entered the war an act was passed calling for the sequestration of all property found in the United State belonging to the German Government and German nationals. Property of the value of approximately $700,000,000 was seized by the American Alien Property Custodian. Much of it has been returned, but there still remains under the control of the Alien Property Custodian property of the value of several hundred million dollars. This is held not only under the trading with the enemy act and supplementary legislation enacted by Congress, but under the terms of the Versailles treaty and the Knox-Porter resolution, which was incorporated into the Berlin treaty, as well as the latter treaty itself.

As Senators will recall, under the treaties just mentioned, the United States was authorized to retain possession of the property owned by German nationals and in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian until Germany made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government by all persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States, who suffered, through the acts of Germany or its agents since July 1, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their person or property, directly or indirectly, or in consequence of hostilities or any operations of war or otherwise.

It has been contended that when the trading with the enemy act was passed, authorizing the sequestration of enemy property, it was intended that the United States should hold the same as a trustee until the war was over, and then return the property to its owners. Certainly there was no intention of confiscating German property. The United States has always opposed the confiscation of property, even though owned by alien enemies. May I say that I am not entirely satisfied with the bill before us, but, as I have indicated, it is a compromise measure and being agreed to by the German Government and the German nationals, as well as by the American nationals who have claims against the German Government and German nationals, I have not felt disposed to interpose obstacles to its passage.

Immediately after the Versailles treaty, notwithstanding the provisions therein found which authorized the retention of the property in question, until satisfactory arrangements were made to liquidate the claims of American nationals, I offered bills in the Senate for the return of this property to the German owners. I took the position that it would be for the best interests of the American people to immediately restore to the German owners their sequestered property.

We were a creditor Nation, and it was apparent that the people of the United States would soon have investments in foreign countries totaling billions of dollars. I believed that it was a proper time to reaffirm the doctrine of the sanctity of private property, even though enemy owned, and I believed that the United States should adhere to its traditional policy and not confiscate property of persons who but a short time before had been enemies. Moreover, I felt that a liberal interpretation of the treaty existing between the United States and Germany at the outbreak of the war was favorable to a policy of restoration. It was my view that our Government should demand of Germany payment of all just claims of American citizens, as well as all just claims of the Government of the United States, and require Germany to make satisfaction. One of the bills which I offered provided for the appointment of a commission to pass upon the claims of American nationals and the United States.

This course was pursued under the treaty of Paris following the Spanish-American War, and the commission made awards to American citizens. My views were not accepted by the Senate, and we have held the property since its seizure in 1917 and 1918.

American citizens had claims against Germany amounting in the aggregate to a very large sum. The years passed and they were not paid. The property of German nationals was locked up in the keeping of the Alien Property Custodian.

Apparently an impasse had been reached and it was imperatively required that something be done to unlock the door so that German nationals might receive at least a portion of their property and that American nationals and the United States might receive compensation. This bill seeks to accomplish that result.

Those who believe, as I believe, that the United States should avoid confiscation and who favored the return of the German property are confronted with a situation that perhaps warrants them and myself in yielding assent to the pending measure.

All nations have at times exercised the right of eminent domain and have expropriated the property of their nationals. The Federal Government can take the property of its nationals for public use but, of course, compensation must be made. Nations in time of war seize the property of their nationals, as well as the property of foreigners within their jurisdiction, expecting, of course, if they are civilized, to compensate the owners for the same. Germany had the right to expropriate the property of her nationals pursuant to the provisions of her constitution. Expropriation may be made by legislation or by treaty but usually by judicial process pursuant to law.

The Versailles treaty provided for the expropriation by Germany of the property of its nationals which had been seized by the Allied and Associated Powers. The property in the hands of the American Alien Property Custodian, by the terms of the Versailles treaty, became subject to another foreign authority, namely, the German Government. That is to say, the German Government, in effect, declared that it seized the property or the use of the property which was in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian and authorized the United States to hold the same until Germany made suitable provisions to pay the claims of the United States and its nationals. The Berlin treaty was the assertion of the sovereign power of Germany, and the latter can by that treaty expropriate the use, if not the corpus, of the property owned by German nationals and in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. HOWELL. But there was set aside 2¼ per cent, and we accepted it. Is it not a fact that the Government accepted it and is now a party to that agreement?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator's question can not be answered in a few words, and in attempting to do so I shall detain the Senate much longer than I intended when I arose. I expected to say a few words only in respect to the amendment which I offered. However, I shall submit a few observations in reply to the Senator's question.

Under the treaty of Versailles the United States was associated with the allied governments, and that treaty provided in a comprehensive way for determining reparations which were to be paid by Germany. A reparations commission was to be set up and machinery was provided for the purpose of ascertaining what Germany should pay to the allied and associated powers and their nationals. We refused to ratify the treaty, and when the Republican Party came into power, following the war, its leaders denounced the treaty and refused to accept its provisions or to participate in the organizations the commissions and agencies set up to carry out the provisions of the treaty. A bitter fight was waged in our country against the League of Nations, and the treaty was repudiated so far as it affected the United States. Our Government took no steps to protect American nationals or the United States or to secure reparations to which they and it were entitled. When conferences were being held by representatives of the allied nations to determine what Germany should pay to the various governments and their nationals, the representatives of our Government refused to participate or to take any steps to protect the rights of American citizens.

I submit that the executive department of our Government failed in its duty to the United States and to American citizens who had suffered at the hands of Germany. It is incomprehensible to me that our Government should have neglected its own citizens and failed in its duty to them and to itself, because those temporarily in power were bitter against the League of Nations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the Senator inquired into the subject, and does he know why, when the Mixed Claims Commission was created, no arrangement was made or apparently attempted for the payment of claims when adjudicated by the commission?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. But it is a fact that it was recognized that under the treaty of Versailles——

Mr. KING. Does the Senator want to ask a question or make a statement?

Mr. HOWELL. I wanted to answer the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Very well, I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. It is a fact that under the treaty of Versailles Germany was required to pay more than she could pay. Thereafter we could not expect to get anything for American claimants who received awards through the action of the Mixed Claims Commission unless we became a party to the agreement of Paris. By becoming a party to that agreement, we received two and a quarter per cent for our American nationals who had received awards. The question is, did we not regard that as adequate at that time? If not, what action did we take, what protests were made? If it were an adequate amount, can we now urge that we are not carrying out the provisions of the Berlin treaty and go back of our acceptance of the two and a quarter per cent?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to discuss the conduct of our Government or the State Department in connection with the amendment which I offered, but the questions which have been propounded and the statements made by my friend from Nebraska call for some observations upon my part. First, let me briefly reply to my friend from Arkansas. In my opinion the treaty of Berlin did not sufficiently protect the United States or its nationals. It did not properly and effectually deal with the claims of the United States and American nationals against Germany and her nationals or make adequate provision for the payment of the claims of our Government and American citizens against Germany and her nationals. The treaty seemed to content itself with the adoption of certain provisions of the Versailles treaty which had been denounced by the administration which negotiated the Berlin treaty, and which the administration referred to had not attempted to avail itself of or to obtain any of the benefits secured in the Versailles treaty for American nationals or the United States.

The administration had a clear field to negotiate a treaty which would have in a comprehensive way dealt with the claims of American citizens against Germany and her nationals; but as I have stated, the Berlin treaty in dealing with the questions of reparations to American citizens merely adopted the Knox-Porter resolution and a few provisions of the Versailles treaty. Then, when an agreement was entered into by the United States and Germany under which the Mixed Claims Commission was set up, no further provisions were made for the payment of any awards that might be made to the United States or her citizens. The Mixed Claims Commission were merely to hear the claims of American citizens and the Government of the United States and then make awards. How and when they were to be paid was not stated; nor in the Berlin treaty was there any provision for the payment of claims of American nationals or the United States.

One would have supposed that either in the Berlin treaty or in some subsequent treaty or agreement provisions would have been made for the settlement of the claims of American citizens. It is passing strange that the executive department of our Government, knowing that the allied nations had set up a commission as provided by the Versailles treaty for the purpose of determining what reparations should be paid by Germany, should have refused to take cognizance of the work of the Commission on Reparations or to appear before the commission for the purpose of protecting the rights of the United States and American nationals. It was common knowledge that the Allies were anxious to have the United States take part in the various commissions and organizations brought into existence for the purpose of carrying out the treaty of Versailles for fixing reparations of Germany and making proper allocation to allied and associated powers of all amounts paid by Germany by way of reparations.

When representatives of our Government refused to take part in these conferences and commissions then the obligation rested upon it to take all proper steps to protect American rights and to secure reparations to American citizens for wrongs done them by Germany. But it was singularly silent and let the years go by without making adequate efforts to have the claims of American nationals against Germany and her nationals provided for.

I am sanguine that there has been no disposition upon the part of the American people to confiscate the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian for the purpose of paying to American citizens and the United States their claims against Germany and her nationals. Our Government must have known that if the allied nations fixed reparations and obtained reparations, they would not be inclined to surrender any portion thereof to the United States after it had repudiated the Versailles treaty and refused to associate itself with the Allies in working out a plan to obtain satisfaction of their claims for damages and reparations growing out of the war.

I repeat when I say that our Government was not justified because of the hatred of some Americans of the League of Nations and the Versailles treaty in refusing to join with our former allies in securing protection for American citizens and a just share of any reparations exacted from Germany.

I have no doubt that if the United States had associated itself with the allied nations the Reparation Commission would have made satisfactory provisions for the settlement of American claims against Germany and her nationals. The United States, for the purpose mentioned, would have been one of the beneficiaries named in the reparation awards and would have received a just proportion of all reparations paid by Germany.

It must have been apparent to the dullest American statesman and officials in authority that when the United States refused to join with Great Britain, Italy, France, and Belgium in making a treaty with Germany and in carrying out the treaty and when it turned its back upon the Allies, with whom it had fought during the war, and said in effect that it would have no association with them in their dealing with Germany and in settling postwar problems, that they would feel constrained to proceed without our cooperation and make and enter into the best terms possible with Germany for their own protection and the protection of their nationals. The allied nations fixed reparations at 132,000,000,000 gold marks. We, the United States, took no part in the proceedings and made no claim to any share of this amount. When it became apparent that Germany was unable to meet this sum the Dawes Commission was set up, not by the United States but by the allied nations, and that commission fixed reparations to be paid by Germany at slightly over $600,000,000 per annum.

The Dawes Commission did not attempt to fix the entire amount to be paid by Germany, but only the annual payments until further arrangements were made. The allied nations assumed (and who shall say they were not entitled to assume?) that the United States having repudiated the Versailles treaty and having refused to associate itself with the allied nations in carrying out the terms of the treaty in fixing reparations that they were entitled to be paid the entire amount fixed by the Dawes Commission.

After Germany began making payments to the allied nations, and their nationals were receiving partial payments upon their claims against Germany, American citizens who had sustained losses and damages at the hands of Germany during the war, demanded that the United States take steps to secure compensation from Germany. The representatives of men and women who had met their death upon the seas by reason of German submarine activities, and American nationals who had valid claims against Germany and her nationals, again and again insisted that Congress or the executive department of our Government, take immediate steps to obtain reparations from Germany and her nationals. Then our Government manifested some activity. It still refused to associate itself with former allies, but in an indirect manner and as some have said through a "keyhole process," began to investigate as to what should or could be done to protect the United States and its nationals. May I say in passing that our Government maintained such an attitude of aloofness toward the allied nations that it did not receive payments made by Germany to the allied nations to meet the costs of the armies of occupation. Senators will recall that under the Versailles treaty Germany was to pay the allied and associated powers all costs incurred in maintaining troops in Germany.

The United States was entitled to more than $225,000,000 incurred in maintaining its army of occupation, but we were so afraid of our former allies, and we were so determined not to have any contacts with them, that we sat by silently while Germany paid the allied nations' costs of the various armies of occupation, including the sum which I have just mentioned and to which the United States was entitled. Finally we began to be awakened from our slumber, and had Mr. Elliot Wadsworth confer with representatives of the allied nations with a view to obtaining this amount which had been paid to cover our costs in maintaining military forces in Germany. An agreement was entered into which, in my opinion, did not meet the situation or fully protect the United States; but it was soon after superseded by an agreement entered into at Paris, by the terms of which the United States was to receive approximately $12,000,000 a year out of future reparations to be paid by Germany, until the sum due the United States, then amounting to $255,000,000, was paid. As a result of the failure of our Government to properly present and properly push its rightful claims, we were deprived of the amount due as costs of the army of occupation, and will only be paid out of future reparations, the payments being extended over a considerable period of years. The Paris agreement has some humiliating aspects so far as the United States is concerned.

As I have stated, we refused to associate ourselves with the allied nations in fixing reparations and made no claims to the reparations fixed when the commission determined the same. But later, when the American claimants against Germany were aroused to the fact that their rights were not being protected and demands were made upon our Government that something should be done for their protection, our Government instructed our ambassador in London to take up the matter with representatives of the allied nations with a view to obtaining some portion of the payments made by Germany under the Dawes plan.

I call the Senate's attention to the Berlin treaty, which was signed at Berlin August 25, 1921, under the terms of which the United States—> is privileged to participate in the Reparations Commission according to the terms of part 8 of that treaty and in any other commission established under the treaty or under any agreement supplemental thereto; but the United States is not bound to participate in any such commission unless it should elect to do so.

Having made this reservation to participate in the Reparations Commission, we refused to avail ourselves of that privilege and threw away the opportunity to protect the rights of the United States and of American citizens. As the demands made by American citizens that their claims against Germany be paid became more importunate, our Government felt compelled to take some steps to bring about that result.

An examination of the Dawes plan seemed to indicate that Germany could not pay reparations in excess of those fixed by the Dawes Commission, and that there were prohibitions against Germany diverting her resources or revenues to the payment of other claims in advance of a full settlement of the claims of the Allies as fixed by the Reparations Commission. Thereupon our Government, it appears, concluded that the claims of Americans could only be paid out of the property of German nationals in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian or out of the reparations fixed by the Dawes Commission. The American people were opposed to confiscation, and thereupon our Government concluded, as I think the facts prove, that the only other source from which payments could be obtained was the Dawes reparation fund. But to obtain a part of that was a question presenting no little difficulty. Appeals were made by our ambassador at London to representatives of the allied nations for a share of the Dawes reparation fund.

The correspondence between our ambassador and Mr. Austen Chamberlain is quite illuminating upon this point. In a communication dated December 4, 1924, addressed to Ambassador Kellogg by Mr. Chamberlain, the latter states that—

> At no time, so far as His Majesty's Government are aware, did the American Government during the discussions that then took place, either within the commission or outside it, make any intimation that they wished to put forward a claim for inclusion in the total to be demanded from Germany.

He states that there was no record of any attempt having been made at the various conferences on the part of the American representatives to claim a percentage in the allotment then being laid down amongst themselves by the Allies for the distribution of the German reparation payments when received.

He further states:

Nor did this create any surprise among the allied governments since it had become generally understood that the United States Government made a special point of not demanding reparation from the powers defeated in the war. In that belief His Majesty's Government were strongly confirmed when, in a speech at New Haven on December 29, 1922, of which the American Secretary of State caused the text most courteously, though informally, to be communicated to His Majesty's ambassador at Washington, the American Secretary of State used the following words: "The crux on the European situation lies in the settlement of reparations. There will be no adjustment of other needs, however pressing, until a definite and accepted basis for the discharge of reparation claims has been fixed. It is futile to attempt to erect any economic structure in Europe until the foundation is laid. How can the United States help in this matter?

We are not seeking reparations. We are, indeed, asking for the reimbursement of the costs of our army of occupation, and with good reason, for we have maintained our Army in Europe at the request of the Allies and of Germany, and consider an agreement that its costs with like Army costs should be a first charge upon the amounts paid by Germany. Others have been paid and we have not been paid. But we are not seeking general reparations. We are bearing our own burden, and, through our loans, a large part of Europe's burden in addition. No demands of ours stand in the way of a proper settlement of the reparation question. It was in these circumstances, as I had the honor verbally to explain to your excellency, that not having hitherto doubted that these words still correctly describe the policy of the American Government, the intimation that they now claimed a share in the Dawes annuities in respect of reparations, and apart from the cost of the army of occupation, came upon His Majesty's Government as a complete surprise.

In a subsequent communication written by Mr. Chamberlain to Ambassador Kellogg, the former states that—

If, therefore, the United States Government is to be admitted to a share in the Dawes annuities, it will doubtless accept the view that such of its claims as may fall within Annex II to Part VIII of the treaty of Versailles should, in equity, be fixed by the Reparation Commission in accordance with the rules on which all other reparation claims have been assessed. His Majesty's Government does not suppose that the United States Government wishes to claim the benefit of the treaty of Versailles without its obligations, or to deprive the allied powers of a guaranty that the American reparation claims against Germany possess the same measure of validity and have been adjusted on the same principles as the allied claims already admitted or to be admitted.

May I say that the letters written by Ambassador Kellogg are very able and present in as strong a light as possible the arguments in favor of the United States participating in the Dawes reparation payments. He is entitled to credit for the efforts put forth in behalf of the United States and her citizens. As a result of these negotiations the representatives of the allied nations finally consented to permit the United States to be paid approximately $12,000,000 annually to be applied in settlement of the claim of the United States for the cost of the army of occupation and 2¼ per cent of about $11,000,000 annually to be applied in liquidation of the claims of the United States and its nationals against Germany and its nationals.

This latter amount was not intended by the State Department, and I am sure it was not intended by the Allies when they conceded that it should be paid to the United States from the Dawes annuities to be a release of Germany from its obligations to the United States and its nationals under the Berlin treaty. Germany was not a party to the arrangement under which the 2¼ per cent of the Dawes annuities were to be paid to the United States. In a sense it was a concession by the allied nations to the United States and it was not intended to relieve Germany of its responsibilities to the United States under the Berlin treaty.

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has stated that 2¼ per cent is our fair share of the Dawes annuities?

Mr. KING. I do not recall, although I have read the correspondence.

Mr. HOWELL. I am referring to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KING. If the Secretary of the Treasury has made that statement, I confess that I have less confidence in his judgment than I have heretofore had.

Mr. HOWELL. I will state that the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Winston, as I recall, before the House Committee on Ways and Means made the statement that 2¼ per cent was our fair share of all that Germany could pay.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not desire to criticize Mr. Winston, but the Senator will recall that Mr. Winston became an active protagonist of the plan by which we were to issue Government bonds in order to pay the claims of American nationals against Germany and her nationals. Apparently he was willing to absolve Germany from the payment of any obligation, except for an indefinite period, and to have the Treasury of the United States pay the American claims. I regarded the plan as unjust and entirely unacceptable. It contemplated taxing the American people—that was the effect of the proposition—to pay Germany for sinking the Lusitania and killing Americans. It did not commend itself to my judgment. And the opposition to the plan, which was included in the Mills bill, was so great that it was hastily abandoned when its injustices were exposed.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not a fact that this bill means placing a burden upon the United States Treasury?

Mr. KING. Yes. It will postpone for many years the payment of the award in favor of the United States against Germany. And, of course, it calls for a direct appropriation of $50,000,000; but this is to pay for the German ships taken by the United States.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not a fact that the 2¼ per cent, if applied in an orderly way to the payment of American awards, would require 80 years, according to Acting Secretary Winston in his statement before the committee?

Mr. KING. And that would be a denial of payment to American claimants, because they will not live 80 years more.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the interest on the American claims be figured at 5 per cent, as is done in this bill, they would never be paid.

Mr. KING. I am of opinion that the amount of interest would absorb the 2¼ per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, although it will pay out in 80 years——

Mr. KING. With 5 per cent interest?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; with 5 per cent interest, according to Mr. Winston when Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. It will pay out in 80 years with the 5 per cent interest.

Mr. HOWELL. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not when the subsequent awards are considered..

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, allow me to read what Acting Secretary Winston stated.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator have in mind the fact that since Mr. Winston made that statement awards have been made and still other awards will be made, perhaps aggregating from fifteen to twenty million dollars?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Winston stated that the total of the awards with interest would be about $250,000,000. The amount is now, I think, in the neighborhood of $256,000,000; so that Secretary Winston was not far out of the way so far as his primary premises were concerned. He stated:

It is admitted that all the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, which Germany is obliged to pay, will aggregate $190,000,000 of principal and $60,000,000 of accrued interest to January 1, 1926, or a total of $250,000,000. The awards bear 5 per cent interest. If no interest is to be paid upon accumulated interest—

That is interest upon interest that has accumulated—

an annuity of $11,000,000—

The annuity is really $10,700,000 as a maximum—would pay current interest and pay the $60,000,000 accumulated interest in 40 years, and thereafter in 40 years more would amortize the principal of the awards; a total of 80 years.

Mr. President, under this bill by some necromancy these awards are apparently to be paid in 39 years.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean the awards of American nationals?

Mr. HOWELL. Every award. Unless there is some magic at the disposition of those who have handled this bill it must be recognized as a fact that, if 39 years is to be the period, somebody is going to contribute toward the payment of these awards and, of course, that somebody is the United States Treasury.

Mr. KING. And the German nationals.

Mr. HOWELL. And the German nationals who are now entitled to their money.

Mr. KING. The German nationals who contribute, as I have indicated, $25,000,000 accumulated interest and the reservation of 20 per cent which goes into the fund out of which the payments are to be made.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the fund to which the Senator has referred, $25,000,000, will not be paid until after 24 years, and by the end of 26⅓ years. The present worth of that $25,000,000 indicates a confiscation of about $17,600,000. The Senator's amendment, as proposed, largely avoids that confiscation; and I believe it ought to be adopted, because I insist we ought not to confiscate one dollar of this alien property fund.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we have no intention of confiscating anything, nor does the bill do it.

Is my colleague through?

Mr. KING. No; I am not through, but I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. When he is through I want to make a statement covering the whole question. It will not be very long.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not agree with my friend from Nebraska in one of his statements, that the 2¼ per cent was intended—that is the way I interpreted his remarks—to absolve Germany from any further payments. I know that that was the view taken by Ambassador von Maltzen in the letter which he wrote to the Secretary of State; but Secretary Kellogg in a powerful statement successfully met the arguments of the ambassador, and demonstrated that it was not intended to release, nor did it accomplish the result of discharging, Germany from the obligation of paying the United States and its nationals the awards made in their behalf by the Mixed Claims Commission.

I repeat, Germany had agreed in the Berlin treaty that we should hold the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian until satisfactory arrangements had been made by Germany to pay the claims of American nationals. Germany made no satisfactory arrangements to pay American nationals. She has made no satisfactory arrangements up until the present moment.

The allied nations secured reparations; and the Dawes plan provided, as I stated, for the payment of $600,000,000 plus annually. We were getting no part of that. We had not interposed. General Dawes was not sent there by the United States, nor did he represent the United States, nor were we represented upon the Reparation Commission as a Government.

While Germany was concerned in the provisions incorporated in the Dawes plan, she could not properly or fairly claim that by its terms she was absolved from meeting her obligations to the United States and its citizens. And any arrangements made by Secretary Kellogg and representatives of the Allied Governments—by which a small portion of the Dawes annuities were to be paid to the United States—did not and could not extinguish her liabilities to the United States and American nationals. Therefore it can be argued that the United States is under no legal obligation to return the property held by the custodian, until suitable arrangements are made to settle American claims against Germany and her nationals.

I confess, however, that this bill does not entirely meet my views. I should have preferred, as I have indicated, to have returned the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian to the German nationals in 1919 and 1920, when I first offered my bill, and required Germany to compensate American nationals for the wrongs which had been done them. I was unwilling to have any sort of taint of confiscation attach to the United States. But the Ebert constitution, as well as the old constitution of Germany under the monarchy, gave the right to the German Government, either the monarchy or the republic, to exercise the right of eminent domain against the property of her nationals, whether the property was in Germany or in any part of the world.

The negotiation of a treaty may constitute the exercise of that power; and the Berlin treaty and the Versailles treaty were the exercise of the power of eminent domain by Germany against the property of her nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian. Germany in effect directed the United States to retain the property of her nationals until she made suitable arrangements to pay the claims of American nationals.

If we had turned back or if we should turn back now the property that is in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian without the consent of the German Government, Germany could then wash her hands of any obligation, and say, "You were a bailee. We put into your hands $300,000,000 of property or more, and told you to hold it until we made arrangements to satisfy the claims of your nationals. You have dissipated the fund and returned it, it is true, to our nationals, but you did it without our consent, and therefore we refuse to pay the claims of American nationals."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to my colleague that the representatives of 97 per cent of the German claimants agreed to this bill.

Mr. KING. Yes; I intended mentioning that in a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. He claims, and I think justly claims, that he has the authority to speak for them; and this is an agreement with 97 per cent of the German claimants.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, what I am chiefly interested in is, What about the American claimants?

Mr. SMOOT. They have all agreed to the same thing. This bill satisfies them; and the representatives of over 85 per cent of the German claimants have agreed that this bill is the proper and best way to settle this matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I yield academic principles to a concrete understanding reached between the German nationals and the American claimants who have claims for damages against Germany.

They have agreed, as my colleague has said, upon the terms of this bill. I confess that I have been surprised at the unanimity with which the German nationals whose property we hold, and the American claimants who have claims against Germany, have acted in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. HOWELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. I yield first to the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. There are two questions I want to ask the Senator; and I will say to the Senator that I am asking for information. I want to be enlightened on this matter.

The first question is, When the Senator says that the German Government had notified our Government that we should not return property of the German nationals which we had taken during the war—did the Senator say that?

Mr. KING. No; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. NORRIS. I was wondering about that statement.

Mr. KING. I said that if we had returned the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian without the consent of the German Government when she directed us, in the Berlin treaty, to hold it until suitable arrangements were made to compensate our nationals, she could have said, "You were an unfaithful bailee. You have dissipated the funds which we left with you, and therefore there is no further obligation resting upon us."

Mr. NORRIS. But that provision was put in the Berlin treaty for the benefit not of Germany but of America.

Mr. KING. It was for the benefit of both.

Mr. NORRIS. I have agreed with the Senator all the time that I did not think it was right for us to take the property of German nationals, when they were themselves innocent of any wrong, just because it happened to be in our jurisdiction, and then use the property for the payment of anybody's debts, government or private; but I could not understand why it would require the consent of the German Government, or why it would make any difference what the German Government thought about it, if we returned to a German national the property we took away from him.

Mr. KING. May I give the Senator an illustration? Prior to the war with Spain there were Americans residing in Cuba, and others who had property there. Some had valid claims, which were recognized, against Spain for damages and for property taken by Spain in the prosecution of the war against the revolutionists. In the treaty of Paris a provision was inserted, under which the United States laid its hands upon the property—part of which were choses in action—of American nationals who had lived in Cuba or had property there, and told Spain that the United States would settle with its own nationals for the claims which they had against Spain. This was done, and the United States got credit for millions of dollars, which under the treaty it was obligated to pay to Spain.

The Senator knows that we "paid for the Filipinos at $2 a head" by seizing American property and applying it in the extinguishment of the obligations of Spain to American nationals, which obligations she recognized. The United States then set up a tribunal, and American nationals came before it and proved their claims, which were finally paid out of the Treasury of the United States. In other words, the United States exercised its sovereign right to expropriate the property of its nationals, and applied the same in payment of its obligations to Spain.

Germany did the same thing. It is true Germany was forced to do it, perhaps, as one of the results of the war; but Germany, as the result of the war, became indebted to the United States, as she was indebted to American nationals; and she was quite satisfied, I have no doubt, when the Berlin treaty was entered into, to agree that the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, of which she had expropriated at least the usufruct if not the corpus, should be held until she made satisfactory arrangements to pay American nationals. So we could not repudiate the act of a sovereign state in expropriating the property, the corpus or the usufruct of property, of her own nationals. We had to take it as a fait accompli, and we took the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian impressed with the sovereign power of Germany when she took the property and told us to hold it until she satisfied American nationals and the United States.

We have held that property for a number of years. The German nationals have been appealing to Germany to do something to pay the claims of American nationals so that the property could be released. American nationals have been appealing to our Government to do something to require Germany to pay in order that they might be compensated before they die for the claims for damages which they had against Germany; and, as a result of many negotiations between representatives of the American claimants and the German nationals, an agreement has been reached with practical unanimity, an agreement which does not meet my views, an agreement which I think does not recognize well-founded principles of international law which I should like to see obtain, but an agreement which meets the wishes of the German nationals and the American claimants, provides for the final payment of the claims which we have against Germany, in part at least, satisfies all parties, and gets rid of a vexed and complicated question which has been here before us since the war, and which, if we do not pass this bill or some suitable measure, may be here for an indefinite time. Of course, the plan agreed upon assumes that Germany will meet the Dawes annuities or make adequate arrangements to satisfy the awards made in favor of the United States and its nationals.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator stated that there was unanimity among German claimants and American claimants.

Mr. KING. Substantial unanimity.

Mr. NORRIS. We have on our desks here a brief prepared by ex-Congressman Lafferty, and in glancing through it I see a great many objections coming from claimants he represents.

Mr. KING. May I say something to my friend?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Mr. Lafferty has been faithful to his clients, as he understood his duty, for which he is to be commended. He appeared before the committee and made a statement in regard to his position on a number of controversial matters, and since the committee reported the bill he has prepared a brief, a copy of which I think the Senator has.

The amendment which is now under consideration is to cover one of the points made in his brief. I have not read it, but I am told it covers this point, and I hope the Senate will pardon me for repeating, because the Senator from Nebraska was not in the Chamber when I spoke before.

Mr. Lafferty claims that it is confiscation to take the $25,000,000 of interest arising from the funds of German nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and return it at the end of 25 years without interest. As I understand him, he makes no particular objection to the diversion of this fund from distribution now.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is the payment of this money deferred for 25 years? Is that necessary?

Mr. KING. That is necessary under this settlement.

Mr. NORRIS. How are we going to get the money to pay it in 25 years?

Mr. KING. It will be paid out of the 2¼ per cent of reparations which, under the Dawes plan, is to be paid to the allied nations.

Mr. HOWELL. Suppose Germany stops paying?

Mr. KING. I was about to say, if Germany does not pay, then the United States will lose the sixty-odd million which is to come to it, because the United States is placed at the end of these so-called priorities, and this $25,000,000 may not be paid, probably will not be paid——

Mr. HOWELL. But is it not a fact that some $52,000,000 will be paid to insurance companies as profit in the meantime?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as profit.

Mr. HOWELL. As profit.

Mr. KING. Something will be paid.

Mr. SMOOT. We will discuss that when we get to it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is no doubt, may I say to my friend from Nebraska, that there is an element of, shall we say, injustice in taking $25,000,000 interest, which has occumulated upon the funds of the German nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and applying it to the settlement which is here made?

First let me say—and I am repeating—that the United States acted as a faithful bailee; it put these funds out at interest.

It was felt by the German nationals themselves that, in order to have an immediate settlement, instead of waiting 5, 10, 15, or 20 years, they would rather make some sacrifices, including the retention of 20 per cent which goes into the fund, and get the matter disposed of. They will receive certificates calling for the payment of the entire amount, with interest, all certificates to bear interest except those issued for the $25,000,000 of interest.

There is, though, with respect to the $25,000,000, an apparent, and as I believe, a real discrimination, and I have offered the amendment to meet that situation.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me complete the Lafferty matter first, and then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. Lafferty made another contention, which I think possessed merit and the committee responded to his contention.

It was represented to the committee that German nationals left money with German banks for the purchase of American securities. Those securities were purchased, and some of them held in the vaults of a branch bank in London, and were seized by the London trustee appointed under war legislation, who sold the securities, and who, according to Mr. Lafferty's view, applied the proceeds derived therefrom in liquidating the debts of German banks to British creditors. In this manner German banks obtained a direct benefit by the application of the funds derived from the sale of securities which they had purchased for their own nationals, by having their own debts extinguished.

It was thought that a provision should be inserted in the bill under which those persons whose property had thus been disposed of for the benefit of the bank should have the right to litigate in the American courts their claims, and attach the property in the hands of the Treasury or of the Alien Property Custodian, and have it held until they could establish their claims against the bank.

The provision in the bill fairly protects claimants of this character, and also goes further and protects American nationals who may have claims of like character against German banks, which have money in the hands of the custodian. They may bring suit in the District of Columbia and attach in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian sufficient funds to meet any judgment they may obtain.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that to be an action by an American citizen against a German bank in Germany?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Suit commenced in the District of Columbia?

Mr. KING. Commenced in the District of Columbia. Of course, it is an action in rem, and under attachment, as the Senator knows, under the great case of Pennoyer v. Neff, in the Supreme Court, the court may obtain jurisdiction by constructive service, though the defendant may be an alien, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. NORRIS. The thing that would give them jurisdiction would be the attachment of the money.

Mr. KING. Exactly; it is an action in rem. The same remedy we give to the German nationals we give to the American nationals.

Now I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, is it not a fact that this agreement and accord, to which the Senator has referred——

Mr. KING. What does the Senator mean by "agreement and accord"?

Mr. HOWELL. As between those Americans entitled to awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, and the German nationals who are interested in the fund in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon. There is a great deal of difference between an agreement and an accord, if he uses the word "accord" in the legal or juridical sense, and I do not want to misunderstand my friend. I beg him to reframe his question so that I may not misunderstand him.

Mr. HOWELL. The senior Senator from Utah stated that there seemed to be an accord between the claimants on both sides and that they had come to an agreement.

Is it not a fact that American claimants have been holding up, by their influence, the payment of these funds in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, insisting that the German nationals should not get their money until provision was made for them to have their awards paid?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know as to that; but I can readily understand that if I were an American claimant, and I had discovered that the German Government had left in the hands of my Government two or three hundred million dollars, with instructions to my Government to hold the same until the German Government made satisfactory arrangements to pay me, as well as all others in like condition, I would say to my Government, "I do not want you to release this fund until I am paid or until assurances are made satisfactory to me that I shall be paid."

There is one thing I do not quite approve. I have felt that some American nationals were too eager to have the American Government assume the payment of their claims and relieve Germany absolutely; and many American claimants were backing the original Treasury scheme, which I think was indefensible, to have the American Treasury pay all of the American claims.

Mr. HOWELL. I acknowledge that the attitude of the American claimants is quite natural, but in view of our history and our position respecting confiscation of private property in time of war over all the 125 or more years of our existence, I ask the Senator if he believes that Congress has been justified in withholding this money belonging to German nationals here for the last nine years?

Mr. KING. My friend must understand my position. I took the position in 1920 that the property should be restored. Senator Knox, now deceased, supported the view which I expressed. But we are confronted now with a different situation. It is more than an academic question before us. It is a practical situation, and even idealists must at times become realists and deal with realities.

Indeed, I sometimes think that the highest form of idealism may call for the working out of proper principles for the recognition and application of realities.

Now, we have this fund here. Germany can not pay American nationals. German nationals say, "We will be glad to have this matter settled now, so that we may obtain 80 per cent of the amount due at the earliest possible moment. The remaining 20 per cent may be deferred and paid with 5 per cent interest at a later date."

Mr. HOWELL. Simple interest.

Mr. KING. Yes; simple interest.

Mr. HOWELL. Just recently the distinguished Senator stated that they might not be able to get any such rate of interest upon their investment, but he knows that simple interest over that period of something like 26 years——

Mr. KING. Oh, no; not so long.

Mr. HOWELL. About 24 years.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator is right.

Mr. HOWELL. It certainly does not at all equal 3½ per cent.

Mr. KING. At any rate, it gives them a settlement of which they approve. They are satisfied with it.

Mr. HOWELL. But they have had a gun held to their heads and have been told, "You will agree to this or you will not get anything."

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator is right. I do not think the United States has taken that position.

Mr. HOWELL. I do not say the United States has taken that position, but the Congress has been a party to such an attitude. What I say is that American claimants have stood in the way of German claimants receiving the funds to which they are entitled, in accord with the policy of this Government for the last 125 years. I feel that the American people ought to be ashamed of the attitude that has been taken in the premises.

Furthermore, I wish to say that, in my opinion, we will bitterly regret it some day, because now we are the great creditor nation. Our property and credits are strewn all over the world, and if we confiscate German property or any other property we will regret it. That is exactly what we are doing if we take this $25,000,000 and do not pay interest thereon. The present worth of $25,000,000 for the average time, 25 years, is only $7,400,000. We would be confiscating nearly $18,000,000 right in this one act.

Mr. KING. I do not want to assent to the view that this is confiscation.

Mr. HOWELL. Then what is it?

Mr. KING. I have stated that the German Government, exercising her undoubted power, has placed that property in our hands and told us to hold it. Now, the German nationals may quarrel with their own Government; perhaps they will. I have no doubt that Germany, when she arises from her postwar condition and becomes the dominating industrial and economic, if not political, factor in Europe, will compensate her nationals, as she is already compensating some of them for property which was taken by the allied nations when found within their dominions during the war. Moreover, if Germany meets the Dawes annuities or makes some settlement with the allied nations and the United States by the terms of which the claims of the United States and its nationals are paid, then German nationals will be fully paid except that the holders of interest certificates will be denied interest on such certificates unless we make provision for the same in this bill.

The Senator knows that in the last report which was submitted by Mr. Parker Gilbert or by the Reichstag attention was called to the fact that it was proposed by the German Government to levy a tax of 1,200,000,000 gold marks for the coming year, as I recall, in order to partially compensate German nationals for property which had been applied by the allied nations in liquidating claims of their nationals against the German Government or German nationals. I think that Germany, as she mounts the steps toward the uplands of prosperity and complete financial rehabilitation, will compensate her nationals for any losses which they have sustained by reason of a portion or all of their property which was seized by the allied nations and applied to liquidate her indebtedness, and they in time will be fully compensated for the sacrifices which they made in behalf of their mother country. Their Government has told us to hold the property.

Now, the German nationals come to us and say, "We want you to release the property," the German Government says, "We want you to release the property," and American claimants say, "We want you to release the property. Concessions have been made in order to reach an agreement between the interested parties."

Shall we stand here and say we will ignore the German Government, we will ignore the German nationals, we will ignore the American nationals, and refuse to accept the settlement which has been agreed to by substantially all of the parties concerned in this matter?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator has pointed out that his attitude in 1923 is exactly my attitude now. The ratification of the Berlin treaty was prior to 1923. Therefore he has changed his position.

Mr. KING. Oh, no.

Mr. HOWELL. Otherwise he would stand here as I stand now—and shall stand—and urge the return of every dollar of German property at the earliest possible moment. It can be done if we will refuse to pay now the insurance companies' profits, amounting to $52,000,000, which are to be paid them under the terms of this bill—80 per cent within three years and the remaining 20 per cent at the end of 21 years thereafter.

I ask the distinguished Senator from Utah if he approves of paying the insurance companies $52,000,000 and taking $40,000,000, or 20 per cent, from the funds of German nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian to do so, because that is what we are doing? We are taking from the Germans that money to which they are entitled that we may pay these insurance companies $52,000,000. We recognize, so far as the Government is concerned, that it has awards which are profits on insurance written, but those profits are to be paid last, and, of course, if Germany does not pay we will not get those profits. Why should we pay profits otherwise to these 45 insurance companies because they are here in the persons of a tremendous lobby to put this bill over?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before my colleague answers will he yield to me

Mr. KING. Certainly .

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to say that when the time comes I shall desire to make a statement to the Senate as to just what the profits have been to the insurance companies. I will have the information in detail, and I assure the Senator from Nebraska that the statement he has made now, according to facts which I am told by people who know are facts, is not justified.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator has asked me a question. Let me answer it. This matter came before the committee and I took the view then that we ought to differentiate between the actual losses of the insurance companies and the profits. That is to say, if they insured a vessel and the vessel was lost, they ought to receive an award for the loss and they ought to be put in the same category as substantially all the other American claimants. I did feel, however, as to their profits the same as I feel with respect to the profits which the Government made upon its insurance business, that they ought to be put in the last category.

But arguments were made by Senators before the committee—and I am not betraying any confidence, I hope, in making that statement. For instance, it was said that American citizens were engaged in the insurance business. The proceeds and profits of the insurance business were distributed among a large number of people as stockholders. There were great risks during the war. Some insurance companies lost and others made profits. Why should an insurance company—I am repeating substantially the argument of some of the Senators before the committee—engaged in a legitimate business, because it made a profit during the war be denied payment pro rata with other American claimants making claims against Germany? It might have sustained losses. Fortunately for it, it did not.

Some German submarines missing the ships at which they fired saved them a loss and thus permitted profits. So the argument was, Why should we penalize them while they are engaged in a legitimate business and put them in the last category?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that all accumulated capital is profit for somebody at some time?

Mr. KING. Exactly. I have stated my position. I voted in the committee for the amendment which the Senator offered.

Mr. HOWELL. I am glad to know it.

Mr. KING. But I think he and I will perhaps stand alone or in the minority in supporting the amendment here. I shall vote for it here, but the arguments against it possessed merit.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has told the Senate that he voted in committee for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. He might well have told the Senate that he was the only member of the committee who did vote for the amendment.

Mr. KING. That is true. I have the good fortune or misfortune frequently to be alone. That does not convince me that I am wrong, though perhaps in this matter I may have been wrong.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Utah to the fact that in voting as he did in the committee he was voting in accord with the traditions of the United States Congress. In 1874 in connection with the Alabama claims this provision was inserted in the law:

> And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court—
> The court of commissioners of Alabama claims—
> by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its own right, or assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to his or its war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

That is the position that has already been taken by the United States Congress. In this bill are awards which, with interest, amount to $52,000,000 for insurance companies which, in their testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, admitted that their aggregate losses during the war, over and above their premiums and expenses, were but $60,000, the premiums amounting to $247,000,000.

Mr. President, in order that we may understand the nature of these claims let me say that when an insurance company insures a risk and has a loss it takes from the premiums collected enough to pay that loss. That is a part of its business; that is its method of doing business. If it did not do that, it would not be in business.

These insurance companies did just exactly that; and they often charged as much as ninety-six times the premiums they had been charging in peace times for voyages across the Atlantic Ocean. Out of the premiums collected they paid their losses and were in the clear; but since then they have gone before the Mixed Claims Commission and said, "Here, my insured had a loss; of course, we paid him for his loss; if we had not paid him you would have to pay him; now, you pay us in his place; we are subrogated to his rights." On that basis the Mixed Claims Commission handed down awards for insurance companies to the amount of $35,000,000. Were they losses in the sense that they had caused misery and misfortune to the insurance companies? No. They were losses that they could expect in the course of their business. Interest at 5 per cent allowed upon those losses brings the total award to these insurance companies up to $52,000,000. As they did not lose anything this $52,000,000 is merely profit, but we are including it in this bill and providing for the payment of 80 per cent thereof within three years, just as we are providing in the case of losses to American citizens who were unfortunate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Who incurred losses in fact.

Mr. HOWELL. They were losses in fact, which meant misfortune and possibly misery and failure. In this case, however, it was merely what the insurance companies anticipated when they took the risks. Their representative testified before the Ways and Means Committee that in peace times on voyages to Europe ships and cargoes were often insured on the basis of one-twentieth of 1 per cent, but that on all of their war-period losses together the average premium had been 4.5 per cent, which, if Senators will figure it out, is ninety-six times what the normal premium often was in time of peace. We should say to these insurance companies, "We are perfectly willing you should have your profit if Germany ever pays." Understand, Germany is paying $10,700,000 a year. That is the maximum we can get.

Germany may not continue to pay it; Germany may pay for only 3, 4, 5, or 10 years longer; we do not know; but these companies say, "We do not want to be put off because we may not get our money; we want it now." And they have been here in the persons of their lobby insisting that Congress provide for the payment of this profit. In order to do so, they have asked Congress, which has respected private property in time of war from almost the beginning of our history, to deduct for them from the Alien Property Custodian funds $40,000,000 so that they may be paid. I am perfectly willing that the insurance companies should be paid if they will wait until Germany pays.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What, then, is the precise form of the Senator's amendment? What does he wish to have done? I ask the question so that I may fully understand the force of what the Senator is stating.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in the United States the rate for marine insurance became so high during the World War that the Congress authorized the Veterans' Bureau to write such insurance. It did so at a profit. It also has gone before the Mixed Claims Commission and made claim upon the same ground of subrogation for its losses, and awards have been made. They, together with interest, amount to about 14 per cent of all the awards of that commission. But, Mr. President, the House committee, the House, and the Senate committee have said, "Of course, those awards represent profits and they ought not to be paid until the last; therefore we will put off their payment until the last 13 years"—the 13 years extending from 26 years hence to 39 years hence—"we will put this character of awards in that class." What my amendment seeks to accomplish is to put the insurance companies' awards in the same class with the Government's awards of the identical character.

Why should we treat them better than we do the people of the United States? There seems to be, apparently, some reason, strong enough, in the minds of some Senators, to lead them to believe that we should not cerebrate in this manner; that the American Treasury, in preference, should be drawn upon whenever an individual might lose, that it should step aside for these insurance companies and their claims for profits.

Mr. President, I hope to discuss this matter further, and I shall offer two amendments. One will provide that we shall not deduct $40,000,000 from the Alien Property Custodian's fund to pay these insurance companies; that we shall pay the German claimants their $40,000,000, and that we shall put the insurance companies with awards of an identical character in the same class in which the committee has placed the United States Government's insurance awards.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is the scope of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me ask the Senator if he can not offer his amendments to-night, so that we may vote upon them and hasten the passage of the bill?

Mr. HOWELL. No; it is late now, and I desire to speak upon them.

Mr. HARRISON. We have sat here and listened to the Senator for quite a while in the discussion of this matter; it is fresh in our minds now, and why can we not vote?

Mr. HOWELL. I hope that this bill will not be voted on to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill passed to-night, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. It is now half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that I understand if the bill can be disposed of this evening there is a purpose to adjourn over until Monday, so as to give Senators the opportunity to attend to office and committee work.

Mr. HOWELL. I suggest that we adjourn until Monday, and take up the bill on that day. I should prefer that course.

Mr. SMOOT. An hour and a half remains before 6 o'clock.

Mr. HOWELL. Debate has been proceeding during the afternoon; this is one of the most important bills that will be before the Senate this session, and we certainly ought not to cut off discussion after so short a time. I have certain other proposals which I wish to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. Can not the Senator do so within an hour and a half?

Mr. HOWELL. I am not prepared to do so this evening. I understood we would adjourn about half past 4.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not give any intimation of that kind to anybody, so far as I recall. I know the feeling of the Senate; from what Senators have told me, they would like to get through with the bill to-night and adjourn over until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 79, line 23, after the word "more," it is proposed to strike out "noninterest-bearing participating certificates," and insert "participating certificates bearing simple interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The amendment to the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HOWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The vote has been announced.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the vote has been announced and the question is settled.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in order, if the bill shall not be passed tonight, that we may have an opportunity to vote on the amendment to the amendment in the Senate, I reserve the right to ask for a separate vote on it when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have two or three amendments which I desire to suggest.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me to present some additional amendments which I desire to offer? Will he yield to me for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 98, after line 24, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 19. Subsection (f) of section 10 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"In the case of any such patent, trade-mark, print, label, or copyright, conveyed, assigned, transferred, or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him, any suit brought under this subsection, within the time limited therein, shall be considered as having been brought by the owner within the meaning of this subsection, in so far as such suit relates to royalties for the period prior to the sale by the Alien Property Custodian of such patent, trade-mark, print, label, or copyright, if brought either by the Alien Property Custodian or by the person who was the owner thereof immediately prior to the date such patent, trade-mark, print, label, or copyright was seized or otherwise acquired by the Alien Property Custodian."

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KING. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 102, after line 22, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

OFFICE OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

SEC. 21. (a) The office of Alien Property Custodian is abolished, and all the authority, powers, and duties of the Alien Property Custodian are transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be held, exercised, and performed by him. All money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian is transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be held, administered, and accounted for in the same manner as though the office of Alien Property Custodian had not been abolished.

(b) No suit, action, or other proceeding lawfully commenced by or against the Alien Property Custodian in his official capacity, or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of the transfer of authority, powers, and duties to the Secretary of the Treasury, but the court, on motion or a supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after this section takes effect, showing a necessity for a survival thereof to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against the Secretary of the Treasury.

(c) All proceedings, hearings, investigations, and other matters pending before the Alien Property Custodian in respect of the authority, powers, and duties transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be continued and brought to final determination before the Secretary of the Treasury in the same manner as though such transfer had not been made.

(d) All officers and employees (except the Alien Property Custodian) appointed under the provisions of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, who, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, have satisfactory records of efficiency and are qualified to perform the duties assigned to them, shall, after the effective date of this section, be retained at rates of compensation fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as nearly as may be, in accordance with the classification act of 1923. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, without regard to the civil service laws, to appoint and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, fix the compensation of such additional officers and employees as may be necessary for the administration of the functions hereby transferred to him.

(e) This section shall take effect upon the expiration of 18 months after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that gives 18 months for the Alien Property Custodian to wind up the affairs of his office. I will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 98, after line 24, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 19. The proviso of paragraph 10 of subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, relating to return to certain insurance companies, is repealed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask that that amendment be read again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The amendment was restated.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I desire to be heard upon the amendment. Is it the purpose or intent to get this bill through this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I should like to clean up every question that I can.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We should all like to clean it up; but I have an amendment to propose which I hope will not provoke argument.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator's amendment will provoke very much argument to-night. I know what it is.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not know as to that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I will withhold my amendment, if the Senator has one which is cognate to this, until his amendment is disposed of, and then offer mine, if the Senator desires.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well.

Mr. KING. I withhold my amendment for the moment, and with the permission of the Senator—because his amendment relates to the same subject—yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 101, between lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to insert:

That section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

Amend subdivision (a) of section 9 by adding thereto the following words:

"That as to any claim or claims filed with the Alien Property Custodian under the provisions of this act against any insurance partnership, association, or corporation for unpaid amounts for losses or damages caused directly or indirectly by the great San Francisco conflagration of April 18, 1906, the right to plead the statute of limitations and/or laches as a defense is hereby suspended. Any number of claimants against any such insurance partnership, association, or corporation for unpaid amounts for losses or damages caused directly or indirectly by the great San Francisco conflagration of April, 1906, may join in the same action.

"Provided, That no insurance partnership, association, or corporation, against which any suit or suits may be filed by any citizen of the United States in any court having jurisdiction thereof within 90 days after the passage of this act shall be entitled to avail itself of the provisions of this act until such suit or suits have been satisfied.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the identical amendment that was in the bill as it passed the Senate last year.

I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing that it shall be adopted now and go to conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to this amendment for very, very many reasons. I do not want to detain the Senate now. I regret, of course, that the chairman of the committee has seen fit to accept the amendment. I do not believe in the wisdom or the propriety of the Federal Government interfering with State statutes in regard to the matter of limitations of actions. I think the legislation is improper and unwise. I shall not detain the Senate, though, in a discussion of it, because I feel quite sure that the conferees, in the consideration of this revolutionary proposition, so manifestly unfair, will very promptly repudiate it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, in the first place, the proposition is not revolutionary.

In the second place, it is not unwise.

In the third place, there are authorities of our Supreme Court for practically three-quarters of a century approving legislation in respect to the statute of limitations.

In the fourth, fifth, and hundredth places, there is justice and right supporting this amendment.

I did say, however, and I now say in the interest of time and peace and harmony, that certainly it would be agreeable to have the amendment go into conference. I shall not be a conferee; I shall not be there to defend the amendment; but I shall hope that Members of the Senate will give heed to the reasons which may appear in the RECORD of the House, and particularly an address made some years ago by a former Congressman, now deceased, Mr. Julius Kahn, of California, and to other facts and arguments which will appear in the RECORD; and I will abide by the decision of the conferees. I will ask that that be done in the interest of time, rather than to take up the attention of the Senate in argument which, to cover the case, would necessarily consume a very considerable amount of the time of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course, if this amendment goes to conference I shall ask the same consideration for mine.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I know there are just a few Senators here; but after this amendment is adopted I want to reserve the right to have a vote in the Senate if I choose.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if one amendment goes in the other should go in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Now, I reoffer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah reoffers his amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 98, after line 24, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 19. The proviso of paragraph 10 of subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, relating to return to certain insurance companies, is repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 99, line 15, I move to strike out the parenthesis, and in line 16 to strike out the comma before the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof a parenthesis. It is simply a mistake in printing; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 94, line 15, it is proposed to insert a new subsection, as follows:

(c) Where the Alien Property Custodian has made demand or requirement for the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to him of any money or other property of any enemy or ally of enemy (whether or not suit or proceedings for the enforcement thereof has been begun, and whether or not any judgment or decree in respect thereof has been made or entered), and where the interest or right of such enemy or ally of enemy in such money or property has not, prior to the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, vested in enjoyment, the Alien Property Custodian may, in his discretion and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, waive such demand and requirement, without compliance with the requirements of subsection (b) of this section, but only with the approval of the Attorney General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Utah to page 46, the top of the page, about the radio stations.

There were two wireless stations in America at the beginning of the war—one at Sayville and the other known as the Tuckerton station. I want to ask the Senator from Utah why we should not place both upon the same plane.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say frankly that the Tuckerton station was sold to private citizens, whereas the Sayville radio station was taken over by the Government; and this bill does not attempt to deal with the claims of individuals or any dealings between individuals. That is why it is out of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, of course I dislike detaining the Senate even for a moment at this late hour, but as a matter of fact one station was sold to the United States, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. And the other one was taken over by the Navy Department under the proclamation of the President.

Mr. SMOOT. They were both taken over by the Navy Department under the proclamation of the President.

Mr. COPELAND. But the Navy Department operated the second station, and then afterwards it was sold and a certain amount was paid to the Alien Property Custodian, but the original owners have never received this money and other receipts.

Mr. SMOOT. One was sold to the United States and one was sold to private parties, and this bill has not undertaken to cover dealings with private parties. The Tuckerton station fell within that class.

Mr. COPELAND. Would the Senator, in order to save time, be willing to accept an amendment to add after the word "station" the words "or rights therein," and then leave out the words "to the United States," in order that the referee when appointed might consider whether they have any rights or not?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say frankly to the Senator that it would do no good. That matter was turned down by the House a year ago, and it was turned down again this year. I do not want to hold out any hope at all to the Senator as to the House yielding. I would not want to be held responsible for having this go in, and have the Senator say, "Oh, well, you did not try to keep it in."

Mr. COPELAND. My responsibility ceases, and so does that of the Senator from Utah, with what we do here. I am sure the conferees will be fair. So I ask that on page 46, after the word "station," in the first line, there be inserted the words "or rights therein," and then in the third line that the words "to the United States" be stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. Really, that has no right in the bill, and I wish that the Senator would not offer it.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not like to have the Senator force me to make an argument.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as I am concerned, it may go into the bill, but I want to say to the Senator now that I have no idea whatever that the House will yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope the House will yield. Anyhow I am very much obliged to the Senator, and I think this is the better way to handle it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 95, line 7, add a new paragraph to section 30, to read as follows:

The remedy by attachment provided for by this section shall extend to any person who may institute any suit at law or in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, against any person to whom any money or property is returnable under this act, and who shall give such bond as may be required by the court, and in any such action or suit where the facts upon which a recovery is sought shall involve the purchase of shares in an American corporation the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to hear and determine such suit or action in accordance with the principles of law and equity as the same was in force in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that is necessary, but I am perfectly willing to have it go in the bill. I think the bill provides for it anyhow.

Mr. KING. There is some controversy as to the proper interpretation to be placed upon the provision of the bill, and this makes the matter clear. If the bill, upon careful examination, shows that it is broad enough to take care of this matter, then this may be discarded, but I think this is better, and clarifies what obviously is an uncertainty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if a German woman marries an American citizen and becomes an American citizen, why should she not be released from the adverse operation of this measure? The trading with the enemy act, as it now exists, directs the return of the property of American women who have married Germans, and thereby become German citizens, quite regardless of the fact that their husbands may have taken an active part in the recent war against the United States. It seems to me that German women who by marriage have become American citizens are certainly in a far better position to request that the rights in their property be respected.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to a woman who was a German citizen. If we began to return property to German women who had become American citizens, though they were the most wonderful women in the world, there would be no end to it. We can not do that.

Mr. COPELAND. Have many German women married American citizens?

Mr. SMOOT. Quite a number of them; I can not tell how many. But the Senator refers to one who was a German citizen; and this bill does not provide, and I know the Senator does not want it to provide, that we should return property to German citizens.

Mr. COPELAND. The judgment of the Senator is that this would be an unwise and improper procedure?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. COPELAND. I wonder if any other Senator has an opinion on that subject. Is the opinion of the Senator from Utah the general opinion?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Amend section 18 of the Finance Committee's report on H. R. 7201 by changing the period at the end of subsection (b) of section 18 to a comma and adding the following words:

Provided, however, That within six months after this act takes effect the Alien Property Custodian shall have filed tentative returns of all such taxes, or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have made tentative assessment of all such taxes, in which case the amount so tentatively returned or assessed shall be paid for taxes by the Alien Property Custodian subject to refund to, or additional payment by, the taxpayer upon the final determination of such taxes after such court review, if any, to which the taxpayer may be entitled. In default of such return or assessment within said six months, no property of any enemy as to which said default occurs shall be retained for taxes, but the liability of the taxpayer to pay 80 per cent of any proper taxes after any court review to which he may be entitled shall nevertheless continue, and any sums repayable to the taxpayer on account of the 20 per cent retained under subsection (m) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act shall, for a period of two years after this act takes effect, be retained by the Alien Property Custodian as security for the payment thereof.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that this subject was presented to the committee, and it was defeated unanimously by the committee. It was presented to the House, and the House refused to take it into consideration. The matter ought to be covered by legislation outside of this bill, if at all. It is foreign to this bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that our late enemies are not responsible for the nonpayment of these taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, they are not responsible in one way; but this would open up the whole question of taxation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the sole purpose of this amendment is to prevent the retention for years, perhaps, of enemy property, until the taxes thereon, while it was in the Alien Property Custodian's hands, shall have been determined. For, under the tax laws, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has five years to assess a tax. Therefore, until 1932 he need not assess taxes for 1927. Hence, in view of the requirement of section 24 of the trading with the enemy act, which compels the custodian to pay taxes out of enemy property, it is conceivable that such property may be retained for five years, until the taxes are determined and paid. This will not only delay the determination of the 80 per cent to be returned to the enemies, but also the fixing of the 20 per cent to be applied to pay American creditors.

The enemies are certainly not responsible for the nonpayment of such taxes, in so far as they have not been paid or assessed. Their property has been in the possession of the custodian for almost 10 years, without any control by them, and the custodian has had and still has power to pay such taxes. The delay, therefore, if in any respect it has been too protracted, whether chargeable to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for not assessing the taxes or otherwise, is certainly not chargeable to the enemies. They should not be made to suffer unduly for something which can not possibly be their fault.

Information from the custodian's office shows that while most taxes, inclusive of 1925, have been paid, no taxes of insurance companies have been paid beyond 1919, and that neither returns nor assessments for any later year have been made.

The proposed amendment, therefore, would require such returns or assessments to be made within six months after the act takes effect, and that no enemy property be retained for taxes except where such return is filed or assessment made within that time, though the liability of the enemy to pay would still continue; and it suggests that any repayment of the 20 per cent retained be kept for two years after the act takes effect as security for the payment of such taxes. As in most cases 20 per cent of the entire property, principal and accrued income, will represent more than the total tax on income, it is believed that ample security is thus afforded where no tax is returned or assessed within the six months.

To permit the custodian to retain enemy property indefinitely because of delay in fixing the tax, not chargeable to the enemy, would seem neither wise nor proper in a bill which purports to make an immediate return of 80 per cent of enemy property.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not like to take a thing to conference which I know we could not agree to. We can not agree to this, and if I am one of the conferees I say frankly to the Senator now I could not agree to it.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator accept it and take it to conference, regardless of its fate?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to have it go in after that statement, I will let it go into the bill, but I want to say that it will never stay in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that all amendments to be offered have now been offered, with the exception of the amendments to be offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. If I could get unanimous consent for a time to vote on the bill without calling for a quorum, I would do so, but I intend now to ask that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator whether we can not agree that after a certain hour on Monday no speech shall be longer than five minutes? Such an agreement will obviate the necessity of calling for a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until Monday, and that after 2 o'clock on Monday no speech on the bill or on any amendment thereto shall be for longer than five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Nebraska has been recognized and will have the floor on the expiration of the recess.

The agreement limiting debate was reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS CONSENT

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, February 20, 1928, no Senator shall speak more than once or more than five minutes upon House bill 7201, to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, etc., or more than five minutes upon any amendment that may be pending or any amendment that may be offered thereto.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.), under the order previously entered, took a recess until Monday, February 20, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, February 17, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"Thy will be done." It sometimes may be very difficult, our Heavenly Father. It may summon us to surrender personal ease; it may cost us the disdain of the world; it may demand of us to give up friendship. Help us to brave all entreaties and commands and be a force that nothing can retard nor withstand. "Love never faileth." Oh, what a radiant flower, whose perfume is always refreshingly fragrant. In it there is no bitterness and no acid in its fruit. It is a freedom from all impurity and an absence from all despair. It is so sweet, healthy, and sane. Teach us, O God, as we are passing on, that "Now abideth faith, hope, love—these three, but the greatest of these is love." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 7032. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.) of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Canton, Ky.;

H. R. 7033. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.) of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Iuka, Ky.;

H. R. 7034. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.) of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Smithland, Ky.;

H. R. 7035. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.) of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the mouth of Clarks River; and

H. R. 7036. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.) of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Eggners Ferry, Ky.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9660. An act authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

THE LATE LAIRD HOWARD BARBER

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House of Representatives the death of Hon. Laird Howard Barber, of East Mauch Chunk, Carbon County, Pa. He died yesterday morning at 7 o'clock at his home, surrounded by his family and many intimate friends, at the age of 79 years.

He was born near Mifflinburg, Union County, Pa., October 25, 1848, and prepared for college in the Mifflinburg Academy. He graduated from Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in 1871. For several years he was principal of the Mauch Chunk public schools, then studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Carbon County June 20, 1881. He was elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-sixth Congress and served with distinction and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents in that Congress from March 4, 1899, to March 3, 1901. He was not a candidate for reelection and resumed the practice of law in Mauch Chunk, Pa.

In 1913 he was elected president judge of the judicial district of Carbon County, was reelected in 1923, and was active as a jurist until a few days before his death.

He was careful and conscientious as a lawyer and statesman, thorough and profound as a jurist, and dignified always. He will be missed by all who knew him.

My State has lost a great and good citizen, a valuable public servant, and a fine Christian gentleman.

I want personally to attest to the fine character and sterling worth of my departed constituent.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave of absence for one legislative day to attend the funeral of Judge Barber to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

GENERAL CLAIMS BILL

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered on the bill H. R. 9285 and all amendments thereto. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 65, noes 12.

Mr. BLANTON and Mr. RAMSEYER objected to the vote and made the point of order that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 280, nays 65, not voting 88, as follows:

SETTLEMENT OF THE INDEBTEDNESS OF THE KINGDOM OF THE SERBS, CROATS, AND SLOVENES

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 367) to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to the United States of America made by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and approved by the President upon the terms and conditions as set forth in Senate Document No. 106, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, is hereby approved in general terms as follows:

SEC. 2. The amount of the indebtedness to be funded after allowing for certain cash payments made by the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes is $62,850,000, which has been computed as follows:

Principal of obligations acquired for cash advanced under Liberty bond acts	$26,126,574.59
Accrued and unpaid interest at 4¼ per cent per annum to Dec. 15, 1922	4,703,423.14
		$30,199,997.73
Principal of obligations acquired by Secretary of War for surplus war supplies sold on credit	24,978,020.99
Accrued and unpaid interest at 4¼ per cent per annum to Dec. 15, 1922	3,358,790.45
		28,336,811.44
		58,536,809.17
Accrued interest at 3 per cent per annum from Dec. 15, 1922, to June 15, 1925		4,390,260.69
		62,927,069.86
Credits:
Payments on account of principal since Dec. 15, 1922	66,709.19
Interest thereon at 3 per cent to June 15, 1925	3,248.28
		69,957.47
Total net indebtedness as of June 15, 1925		62,857,112.39
To be paid in cash upon execution of agreement		7,112.39
Total indebtedness to be funded into bonds		62,850,000.00

SEC. 3. The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on June 15 of each year up to and including June 15, 1987, on a fixed schedule subject to the right of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes to postpone such payments falling due after June 15, 1937, for two years, such postponed payment to bear interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum. The amount of the annual principal installments during the first five years shall be $200,000. Commencing with the sixth year the annual principal installment shall increase $25,000 a year for the succeeding seven years. Commencing with the thirteenth year the annual principal installment will be $400,000, the subsequent annual principal installments increasing until in the sixty-second year of the debt funding period the final principal installments shall be $2,406,000, the aggregate principal installments being equal to the total principal of the indebtedness to be funded into bonds.

SEC. 4. The Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of principal of the bonds on June 15 and December 15 in any year.

SEC. 5. The bonds to be issued shall bear no interest until June 15, 1937, and thereafter shall bear interest at the rate of one-eighth of 1 per cent per annum from June 15, 1937, to June 15, 1940; at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum from June 15, 1940, to June 15, 1954; at the rate of 1 per cent per annum from June 15, 1954, to June 15, 1957; at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from June 15, 1957, to June 15, 1960, and at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum after June 15, 1960, all payable semiannually on June 15 and December 15 of each year, until the principal thereof shall have been paid.

SEC. 6. Any payment of interest or principal may be made at the option of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in any United States Government obligations issued after April 6, 1917, such obligations to be taken at par and accrued interest.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. It was favorably reported at the last session and passed the House at the last session, and, so far as I know, there is no particular opposition to it. It was also favorably reported by the Senate Finance Committee, but was lost in the Senate filibuster, otherwise it would be a law by this time.

I can not explain the provisions of the bill any more particularly than they are explained by the bill itself. The amount of the indebtedness as funded is fixed at $62,850,000, of which fifty-one million and odd dollars represents principal and eleven million and odd dollars represents interest. The total payments to be made to us are $95,177,635. On a 4¼ per cent basis the present value of these payments is $20,236,000, or about 32 per cent of the debt funded. On a 3 per cent basis the value is $30,286,000, or about 59 per cent.

This Kingdom is one of the poorest countries we have had anything to do with. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who is a member of the Debt Commission and is very familiar with this, I think, can explain the details possibly a little better than I can.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind answering a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not at all, but I think possibly the gentleman should ask his question of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to ask it of the chairman of the committee. This Congress gave the Government of France one of the most liberal and generous settlements that one country could be expected to give another. Does the gentleman know of one single act the French Government has ever taken toward ratifying that debt settlement?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to continue to let her float her loans in this country and continue taking good American money over to France or are we going to stop such transactions?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not answer that question, because I do not control those matters.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman could do this: The gentleman could pass the resolution that I have had pending before his committee for a long time, to stop the cashing of French bonds or the flotation of such loans in this country until France does ratify the debt settlement we made with her.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I could if I had sufficient votes, but I have some doubt about that.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman would pass that resolution and stop France from getting new money in this country, I think she would then do something quickly about this settlement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Possibly, but that is not before the House.

The country involved in this bill is a very poor country and is ready to settle.

I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Debt Commission before it went out of existence, I agreed to this settlement. It is a very generous settlement on the part of the United States, but in my opinion the settlement represents the full capacity of Yugoslavia to pay its indebtedness to the United States.

As you know, the Yugoslavian Kingdom was set up as a result of the war. It is the old Kingdom of Serbia with new territory added to it. During the war we advanced to Serbia approximately $25,000,000 in cash and about $30,000,000 in war supplies. Serbia was fighting with the Allies. Serbia was overrun by the armies of Germany three times, and there was greater devastation in Serbia and the territory now embracing Yugoslavia than any of the European countries.

It has about 50,000,000 acres of land and 30 per cent of it is in forest. A very small part of the land, owing to the mountainous character of the kingdom, is arable. Yugoslavia has practically no industries. Only 5 per cent of her population are engaged in industrial activities, the rest being engaged in agricultural pursuits. They barely make enough crops to feed themselves, and Yugoslavia has to import a great part of her food supplies consumed by her citizens residing in the cities.

The railroads were practically all destroyed during the war, with the bridges and culverts destroyed, and up until now they have not been permanently repaired, although there have been some temporary repairs. About the only fund Serbia has had for this purpose is from reparations from Germany, and the reparations were principally property in kind, railroad iron, cars, and things of that kind. Yugoslavia has received very little cash on account of the German reparations.

It was shown to the Debt Commission without doubt that Yugoslavia financially was the poorest off of any of our debtors; that the standard of living in Yugoslavia is lower than the standard of living of any other of our debtor class, and, of course, this standard of living is not from choice but is from necessity.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. What is the population of this country?

Mr. CRISP. The population is between 12,000,000 and 13,000,000 people.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the report show what percentage of the total amount due this settlement represents?

Mr. CRISP. Reduced to present cash value?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; does the report show that?

Mr. CRISP. I think it does; but if it does not, I will answer the question.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I wish the gentleman would do that.

Mr. CRISP. The total amount of the indebtedness funded, including the cash advanced and the war supplies furnished with interest up to the date of settlement, is $62,850,000. If this settlement is complied with, the United States will receive back $95,177,635.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. How much of that is principal and how much is interest?

Mr. CRISP. We advanced in cash $26,000,000 and the interest on that at 4¼ per cent, to December, 1922, the date of settlement, was $4,000,000, making the principal and interest under that item amount to approximately $30,000,000. We advanced war supplies amounting to $24,978,020 and the interest on that was $3,358,000, making a total of $28,336,811, including the principal and interest. The total amount of the debt, including principal and interest to date of settlement is $62,850,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I just want to get into the RECORD——

Mr. CRISP. I will answer the gentleman's question right now. These payments are to be made over a period of 62 years. Reducing them to the present cash value, such value will, of course, depend on the rate of interest upon which the calculation is made, but if you put it on a rate of interest of 4¼ per cent, the present cash value would amount to $20,000,000, or 32 per cent of the debt funded. On a 3 per cent basis the present cash value would be $30,000,000, or 59 per cent of the principal.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Were these amounts advanced for war supplies advanced prior to the end of the World War or were some of the advances made subsequent to the end of the World War?

Mr. CRISP. I am not absolutely sure, but I think some of them were made after the World War.

Mr. BURTON. If the gentleman will excuse me, I think I can answer that question. The advances in cash, prearmistice, were $10,605,000; postarmistice $15,454,000, just about in the proportion of three after the armistice and two before.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. ARENTZ. If I remember correctly, during the time of the discussion on the Italian debt settlement either the gentleman from Georgia or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] made the statement that the average wage in Italy was $100 a year, the lowest living wage in the world with the exception of the Asiatic countries. Now the gentleman says that Yugoslavia is still lower in the standard of living than Italy. Is this true?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; when the Italian settlement was presented to the House, which was prior to this settlement, all the data and information obtained by the Debt Commission showed that the standard of living in Italy was the lowest of any country in Europe that we had dealt with, and I think that is true. This settlement came later, and while I personally have no first-hand information as to the standard of living, for I have never visited there, but when this settlement came up it was represented to the commission and conclusively proved that the standard of living of these people was lower than any other country in Europe. I am not speaking from first-hand information.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does the gentleman know what the average wage is in Yugoslavia?

Mr. CRISP. I did know, but I can not recall. I did not know this matter was coming up until a few moments ago. The settlement was made in January, 1926, and passed the House in May, 1926. I have not had time to refer to my files or to any documents connected with the settlement to refresh my memory at all. I have had many other matters on my mind since 1926, and I did not know until 12 o'clock to-day that this case was coming up.

As I stated, this is a very generous settlement on the part of the United States.

For the first 12 years no interest is to be paid. For the first five years Yugoslavia is to pay $200,000 a year to the United States. For the seven succeeding years that $200,000 is to be increased $25,000 a year. Beginning in 1937, interest is to be paid at a nominal rate of one-eighth of 1 per cent, which is practically no interest. Then we increase from one-half to 1 per cent, and the last 27 years it is to bear 3 per cent interest. But when this settlement is carried out by Yugoslavia, I, as an American Congressman, will be indeed proud and delighted. If it is carried out the United States Government will get back all the principal for cash, war supplies, and about $11,000,000 interest in addition.

This settlement was based on the same basis as all the other settlements made by the Debt Commission on the capacity of the nation to pay.

Now I believe that every individual and every nation should meet by paying 100 cents on the dollar and interest, every moral and legal obligation if it is able to do so.

The only excuse for compromising a moral or legal obligation is the incapacity or inability to pay in full. Many honorable people owing just legal debts are unable to pay in full; they do the best they can to make a compromise, and any business house, whether individual or corporate, if they have an insolvent debt where they can not collect 100 cents they collect what they can. A half a loaf is better than no loaf. This common sense, hard-headed business rule was followed by the Debt Commission. In my opinion, the validity of the international contracts and international obligations should remain sacred and settlement had on the capacity of the debtor nation to pay. The commission was of the opinion that this settlement represented the full maximum capacity of Yugoslavia to pay, and as a member of the commission I agreed to it, and as a Member of this House I am supporting it, for I think the settlement considering all the facts and equities—the loans were not made for commercial purposes but to aid in carrying on a mutual war—reflect credit on the United States and Yugoslavia.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In view of the poverty of this country, in view of the fact that it was so completely ravaged, being almost from one end to the other a battle ground during the war, with very little resources, and those largely taken away from it, and in view of the further fact that we all know its recovery is necessarily very slow, because it has practically no industrial concerns, does not the gentleman think that we would be very fortunate if we get this sum in full?

Mr. CRISP. Unquestionably. I expressed the thought that I would be delighted if we collected from Yugoslavia the amounts provided for in this settlement.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. In view of all of the circumstances I am surprised that you got as advantageous a settlement out of Yugoslavia as you have related. As I understand it, the percentage they pay is a higher percentage of what they owe the United States than Italy pays.

Mr. CRISP. On the percentage based on similar rates of interest, I think the Italian settlement was about 30 per cent and this is 59 per cent, that is, on a 4¼ per cent basis, and on a 3 per cent basis it is 32 per cent higher than the Italian settlement.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat in the position of the theological professor who was asked some questions about the atonement. He said, "In the sixth volume of my works, on page 450, you will find out all about that." The student replied that he had examined that statement, and that it was not entirely clear. The professor then said, "Well, those are the best views that I have on the subject."

If anyone wishes to refer to this subject more fully, I refer him to page 10737 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the last Congress, in a discussion had at that time on June 4, 1926.

There is very little to add to what Mr. CRISP and Mr. GREEN of Iowa have so excellently said. Some of the figures I shall try to make a little more clear, but I do wish to review very briefly the policy of the Debt Commission.

The first rule was that the principal of the debts should be paid in full. Second, that in the payment of that principal, the utmost leniency, compatible with that which is right as between the parties, should be exercised in the rates of interest and the time for payment. The time for payment was fixed at 62 years in the settlements made. The third point was that the capacity of the country to pay should be taken into account. The question has been raised here as to why the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes—Yugoslavia—should not have been treated quite so favorably as Italy. If you figure on the basis of four and a quarter per cent, Italy pays 26 per cent in her payments, while Yugoslavia pays 32. For that discrimination, if you may call it such, there are two reasons. In the first place, the debt of Yugoslavia is very much smaller than that of Italy. The principal sum of the debt of Yugoslavia, prior to funding, was figured at $66,164,000, while that of Italy was $2,150,000,000—thirty-two times as great. The per capita debt of Italy is very much larger than the per capita debt of Yugoslavia; but there is another reason more compelling, and that is a very large share of the loans and advances made to Yugoslavia was after the armistice. Whenever anyone criticizes our settlements with foreign countries I wish that he who answers would emphasize the fact that a large share of the loans and advances were made after the armistice, when threat of war was very remote. The amount in money advanced to Yugoslavia, or the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, was $10,605,000 before the armistice, which was the virtual close of the war. After that the advances amounted to $15,454,000, so that the proportion of advances after the war was as one and one-half to one. Then, again, the value of surplus supplies, largely for food and clothing—it was not so largely for military supplies—and that mostly after the armistice, amounted to about $25,000,000, making in all approximately $51,000,000 of principal, and the interest up to June 15, 1925, makes in all $62,850,000.

Before leaving this subject I desire to answer the argument that is made in Europe and is made perhaps even with a louder note in our own country, about the manner in which we have treated our foreign debtors. I say here, and I have said everywhere, that any accusation of severity against the United States is entirely unwarranted. We were actuated by the principles of generosity in the settlements of our debts with all of these countries. Let us look at the settlement of Yugoslavia for a minute. The principal sum, computed as of June 15, 1925, after the payment of the trivial amount of $7,000 and a little over, is, as I said, $62,850,000. The payment begins at only $200,000 a year, without any charge for interest whatever. At the end of five years there is an increase to $225,000, then to $250,000, then to $275,000, and then to $300,000, and the final payment of principal in 1987 is $2,406,000. No interest is charged until June 15, 1937. Thereafter it is one-eighth of 1 per cent from 1937 to 1940. Then one-half of 1 per cent, rising by gradation through 1 per cent and 2 per cent, finally to 3½ per cent from 1960 to 1987.

Let me call your attention to the total expenditures of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and how large a burden it is on them. The total annual expenditures, according to the last available statement, amount to about 10,000,000,000 dinars, as they are called. The nominal par value of the dinar is the same as that of the French franc, 19.3 cents, but the present gold value is less than one-tenth of that.

At the depreciated rate of exchange the total annual expenses amount in gold value to approximately $180,000,000, and of that we are asking them for the first five years an annual payment of only $200,000, and the last and largest payment, without the computation of interest, is $2,406,000. Interest will be $84,210. Is that unduly severe? Note how very small a percentage of their total expenses must be paid to us.

Now, I want to make another comparison. They are expending to-day in the way of military expenses $36,000,000 a year for the maintenance of their military establishment, gold value. The amount computed in dinars is 1,956,000,000, or close to 2,000,000,000 dinars, of the gold value of $36,000,000, as against this payment of $200,000.

Now, when a careful survey is made of the situation, it is apparent that the accusations made here and abroad against the United States are utterly incorrect and should fall to the ground.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Would the gentleman care to give us his views as to the status or prospect of getting anything out of the French Government on account of our loans to it?

Mr. BURTON. I would not want to go into that. I think their feeling is that they must first stabilize the franc. Of course, there is a very strong sentiment in France opposed to the settlement on the basis adopted here in the House and approved by the French ambassador and their cabinet. But I am hopeful of a settlement and the acceptance of the terms we made.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Does this settlement include loans made subsequent to the armistice?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Did the settlements heretofore made with creditor nations include the loans made to them since the armistice?

Mr. BURTON. In the case of this country, yes. All these claims are included.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. All of them?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; all of them.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Some of us under the questioning of our constituents find it easy to say that we had a splendid commission, and that they regarded the capacity of the debtor country to pay. I hope the gentleman will tell us this morning how we can explain the application of a 62-year yardstick to every country, whether it is small or large. I sometimes find myself asking myself in a spirit of ridicule questions in relation to this 62 years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Make it five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BURTON. The first settlement that was discussed elaborately was that with England. On the marshaling of figures so that the payments would have some degree of equality in the aggregate or total of principal and interest each year, as, for example, 3 per cent in the first 10 years and then 3½ per cent, it was found that if you make the aggregate of principal and interest equal, 62 years' time would be required.

That was the reason; also with the thought of giving plenty of time for payment, 62 years was fixed upon in the settlement with England. It was thought that in the settlement with other countries the same time should be adopted. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts will recognize that the interest is diminished each year by the payment of principal, though there is an increase by the change from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent. On the other hand, payments of principal increase. I believe that the settlement with Finland was the next settlement after that made with Great Britain.

Mr. GIFFORD. In determining the capacity of the country to pay, it seems hard for people to understand that the capacity to pay should be measured exactly by the 62-year limit.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the period was fixed with the idea entirely of the capacity to pay; but the capacity of the debtor country to pay was carefully taken into consideration. The long period is in part explained under the other fact I mentioned, namely, that this country should show the greatest possible degree of leniency consistent with what was right and fair to the country with which we are dealing.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman include in his remarks a statement of just how much of the money and property we advanced to the people of Europe before the armistice, and how much was advanced after the armistice?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. I am exceedingly reluctant ever to ask to insert any remarks of my own in the RECORD, and I think I have never made a request on the floor of the House to that effect. But there is an address that I delivered in joint discussions with divers persons that is contained in the Kiwanis Magazine, giving the figures requested. Although it is contrary to my practice heretofore, I will ask unanimous consent to have that printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks an article written or an address delivered by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by myself:

INTERNATIONAL WAR DEBTS

From a moral standpoint, the action of a country which asks that loans made by it to other countries shall be repaid can not as a general proposition be criticized. It is a general rule not only in public but private transactions that obligations incurred must be met.

During the war there were numerous discussions and communications between the United States and the other governments in regard to the advances made. It is true that there were individual expressions in Congress when the subject of making loans to those nations who were termed "at war with the enemies of the United States" was under consideration to the effect that the question of payment was not material. We had entered the war; it was regarded as a life and death struggle between the United States and her allies on the one side and the Central Powers on the other. Nevertheless, responsible expressions of officials were all against cancellation; propositions made at Versailles that the expenses of the war be pooled were not received with favor; suggestions to the Treasury Department coming from foreign officials advocating a revision or cancellation were promptly rejected. Secretary of the Treasury Houston on March 1, 1920, and President Wilson, in his reply to a letter from Premier Lloyd-George, on November 3, 1920, unequivocally stated their opposition to any suggestion of cancellation, and the same reply was communicated by other officials of the United States Government. Action in Congress was all to the same effect.

At the very beginning of our participation in the war Premier Ribot, of France, when he heard it was proposed that we make an advance as a contribution, expressed the hope to our ambassador that no resolution would be introduced or debated in Congress tending to make a gift to the Government of France from the United States, however much the sentiment of good will prompting it might be appreciated by the French people. The French Minister of Finance suggested that 30 years should be the period for amortization or payment. Premier Poincaire also has frequently stated that France recognized the validity of their debt and intends to pay it. In the confusion following the war, and in view of the very serious financial embarrassment of our allies, no active measures were taken for collection, but it should be said that partial payments were made by certain nations.

WHY SHOULD THE UNITED STATES REQUIRE PAYMENT?

What are some of the reasons why the United States should require payment, at least to the extent of the capacity of her debtors? In the first place, there is the sanctity of international obligations, especially between governments. Distinct promises to pay were made by our debtors; the legislation authorizing advances to other countries contained provisions relating to rates of interest and relating to the disposition of the money when repaid. There is no argument that can be derived from the contemporaneous transactions which would lead to the belief that release or cancellation was contemplated. There is not only the sanctity of these obligations but the question may well be asked: Would it be best for the borrowing countries themselves if these debts should be repudiated? If later a great emergency should arise, it would be impossible for them to obtain the needed credit, either from the Government of the United States or from private individuals.

The second reason for repayment is that these loans to foreign governments were not made from current funds or from an overflowing Treasury but the amounts were obtained by borrowing from our own people. An intensive campaign was conducted to obtain money for our own participation in the war and for these loans to our allies, with certainly a general understanding that the amounts would be repaid. Thus there is this very important phase of the situation—the Government of the United States is a trustee for the American people. Anyone who advocates the cancellation of these debts, and is thoroughly sincere, should bring his bonds to the Treasury and give them up for the benefit of the persons who subscribed these vast sums for loans to our allies. In the next place, rich as we are and enjoying as we do now the most favorable conditions, our sacrifices proportionately were as great as those of any European country or any of our allies. If we are a fortunate nation now and the wonder of the world, we were fortunate before the war. Our debt then was less than a billion of dollars. We expended $35,000,000,000 in the prosecution of the war. We incurred a debt which at one time amounted to $25,500,000,000. We have been paying $800,000,000 of annual interest, and however much this burden may be diminished it will rest upon the American people with heavy weight for many years to come. As a direct result of the war, we expended $492,000,000 in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, for the Veterans' Bureau, and propositions are now pending to increase that amount.

We were by no means in the same dangerous position as our allies. When we entered the war it was not as the result of a threat to our safety or of long-standing animosities with any country. We were detached in the New World. We were profiting by the furnishing of supplies to the combatants. We were not compelled to send our young men across the sea to be shot to death in the trenches. While our entrance into the war was precipitated by insults and by interference with our rights, which we could not tolerate, there was, nevertheless, a large element of altruism in our action, a desire for the perpetuation of popular institutions, and a feeling that our allies were in the right. On the other hand, if we consider the countries with which we joined in the contest, their very life was at stake. At one time the armies of the Central Powers advanced within 15 miles of Paris. If the Allies' armies had been defeated, the indemnities imposed upon them would no doubt have been far and away greater than the $10,000,000,000 debt which they owe to us.

Again, let us take the results of the war. We have claimed no large reparations, no accessions of territory. Some of our allies have even multiplied their areas, and every one of them has been benefited by additional territory, which must mean in the future a position of greater power, as well as an enlargement of their trade and a very substantial source of wealth.

Last of all, let me say that if we forgive these debts the inevitable result will be an addition to the military equipment of Europe constituting a threat to the peace of the world, and if there is one thing in which we hope for leadership among the nations, it is for an abatement of military armament and the promise of cooperation and peace in the world. The efforts which have been made for a reduction or limitation of naval equipment and of armed forces have unfortunately disappointed expectations. Really the only practical success in diminishing armament was at the Washington conference of 1921–22. At this writing in August, 1927, it seems almost certain that the Conference for Limitation of Naval Armament now pending between the United States, Great Britain, and Japan will result in failure. Is it not worthy of our consideration that the countries which are indebted to us are spending sums far greater for military purposes than they must devote to payments on their war debts? Of this, however, I will speak later.

THE HISTORY OF THE DEBTS

The facts relating to the settlements with Europe should by this time be familiar to all, though it is surprising to note how widespread is the ignorance upon this subject. It will be profitable to survey the history of these debts. They were authorized by legislation in April, 1917, the month in which we entered the war, and by later statutes. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, was authorized to make loans or advances to countries "at war with the enemies of the United States." There were later statutes increasing the amount authorized to be loaned; also for the sale of surplus supplies and for assistance in supplying food and other necessaries. Approximately $10,340,000,000 was loaned or advanced to our debtors—20 in number. Two of these—Armenia, to which $12,000,000 was advanced, has no government with which we can deal; Russia, to which an advance of $192,000,000 was made, repudiates the debt. In view of the poverty of Austria, payment of the $24,000,000 which was advanced to her has been postponed until 1943. Liberia, to which a trivial sum was advanced, has paid, and so has Cuba.

DEBT COMMISSION APPOINTED TO STUDY FACTS

In February, 1922, a debt commission of five members was organized by act of Congress, to which three members were added in the following year, with a view to making it nonpartisan. I do not desire to enter into any elaborate defense of the Debt Commission, officially designated as the World War Foreign Debt Commission, which originally included the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, chairman; Mr. Hughes, then Secretary of State; afterwards his successor, Mr. Kellogg; Mr. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce; Senator Smoot; and the writer of this article, to which were later added another Member of the House, Mr. Crisp, of Georgia; former Representative Olney, of Massachusetts; and Mr. Edward N. Hurley, of Chicago. It must be said, however, that the commission gave the most careful study to this subject for four years. They held long consultations with leading experts of Europe, including the present Prime Minister of England and the governor of the Bank of England, financial ministers, and prominent representatives of other foreign countries, and our own diplomatic officials and the representatives of the Treasury and Commerce Departments. The financial status of each country with which we dealt was considered. It would be quite impossible for another commfssion or for any private organization, however competent the members might be, to give the careful consideration to the capacity for payment of foreign countries that was given by the commission during the more than four years in which it functioned.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF COMMISSION

That commission at a very early date laid down three fundamental principles: First, that the principal sum of the debts should be paid; second, that the greatest possible leniency should be shown in rates of interest and time for payment (62 years was the period fixed); third, that in determining terms as to time for payment of the principal and rates of interest "capacity to pay" should be taken into account. The legislation at first provided that the interest on all loans should be not less than 4¼ per cent and that payment should be made in 25 years. The commission very substantially departed from this first mandate of Congress by more lenient treatment to all the debtors. It was made necessary that the settlements made by the commission should be first approved by the President and next by both Houses of Congress. Settlements have been negotiated by the commission with all countries, excepting with Greece and with Armenia and Russia mentioned above, and all these settlements have been ratified except that the Senate has not approved the agreement with Yugoslavia, though it is evident approval will be given at an early date, and neither the Senate nor France has approved the settlement with that country negotiated by her ambassador and approved by the French cabinet.

The criterion of "capacity to pay" adopted by the commission has been criticized. Can anyone suggest a more just or better standard? What other rule is adopted in transactions between private creditors and debtors? Would it be reasonable to seek to enforce a uniform rule under which, for example, Austria, one of the poorest countries in Europe, should be subject to the same terms as Great Britain, with an income of a billion dollars a year or more from foreign investments?

COMMISSION WAS LENIENT IN SETTLEMENTS

The commission was most lenient in its settlement with foreign countries, and taking as a basis the rate of interest which we have been paying upon our own obligations, 4¼ per cent, we canceled or abated 75 per cent of the debt of Italy, 53 per cent of the debt of France, an average of 58 per cent of the debts of all the countries on the Continent of Europe, and 20 per cent of the debt of Great Britain. Among those who favor revision there has been an almost universal note. They have said, "We do not favor the entire cancellation of the debts, but we do favor a reconsideration and a revision." What proportion would they cancel, and would they make the percentage of cancellation equal for all countries? A very singular feature of the situation is that payments approaching a billion of dollars have been made by our foreign debtors in accordance with settlements made by the Debt Commission; that no demand has been made by any prime minister, finance minister, or responsible official for a revision of the settlements made; payments have been made as they have fallen due and there is every indication that those who owe us regard these settlements as final. But in our own country there is an agitation, not so much for cancellation but, it is alleged, for revision. The exact terms of the revision are not specified, but like many movements which have as their basis mere generalities, this demand has gained considerable following. If it were not for the agitation in the United States there is every probability that France would have agreed upon the settlement proposed long before this.

BURDEN CAN HARDLY BE CALLED CRUSHING

It is said that the burden is a crushing one for the countries involved. If we consider this question from the standpoint of the share of the revenues which must be applied in payment of these debts, several countries show startling results. For the first five years six-tenths of 1 per cent, or about one one-hundred sixtieth part of the total revenue of Italy is applied in payments to us; in Czechoslovakia, for a long period it is almost exactly 1 per cent, or one one-hundredth part of their total revenue. It is true that France, if the settlement with that country is ratified, and Great Britain pay a substantially larger proportion of their revenues. The greatest credit is due to Great Britain, for with a desire to maintain their credit unimpaired the British have sought to pay their obligations to us and have taken advantage of none of the options they have for making the burden lighter.

The payments of most countries under the settlements made increase in the passing years, and this is based upon confidence that conditions in Europe will improve. Nearly three-fourths of the earlier payments are made by Great Britain. The aggregate amount of principal and interest to be paid by all countries is $210,000,000 in 1927, increasing to $217,000,000 in 1930, and to $300,000,000 in 1935.

COMPARISON OF INDEBTEDNESS AND FOREIGN MILITARY EXPENSES

Let us make another comparison—the amount of indebtedness to us as compared with the military expenses of the various countries of Europe. In France in the last year for which figures are available, appropriations for military purposes (and there are no doubt extras) were 5,169,000,000 francs; according to the present rates of exchange, say about $200,000,000. As against this amount it is proposed that France pay $30,000,000 to us in the first year, increasing to $35,000,000 in the fifth year, these amounts to apply on principal and no interest to be charged until the beginning of the sixth year. Great Britain has military expenses aggregating $582,000,000 per year, or about three and one-half times what they are paying to us, although her payments are by far the largest. Her increase in military expenses over pre-war times in 1914 is about $200,000,000 annually, or $40,000,000 more than they are paying to us. Czechoslovakia, a country of about 12,000,000 people, maintains a standing army of 150,000 men. The appropriation for national defense for 1926 was approximately $50,000,000. All that country is paying to us for 18 years is $3,000,000 per annum; that is, in 18 years she will be paying to us on debts but $4,000,000 more than her military expenses for one year. The annual military expense of Rumania is $27,000,000. Their total debt to us is about $44,590,000, so that in less than two years their military expenses would enable them to have a "clean slate" as to their indebtedness to the United States.

INVISIBLE BALANCES BETWEEN COUNTRIES

It has been said that the only manner in which the debts can be paid is by an excess of merchandise exports to this country. This statement, which is less than a half truth, overlooks the so-called invisible balances between countries. In the year 1925 American tourists spent in Europe at least $370,000,000, of which $225,000,000 was spent in France alone. This amount expended in France is seven and one-half times as much as the first payment that she must make to us according to the proposed settlement. The estimated expenses of tourists in 1926 were even larger than in 1925. A very considerable amount is being sent abroad also by immigrants each year; the estimate is about $200,000,000. The amount received in England from gold mines of South Africa is another illustration of the ability of countries to pay otherwise than by excess of exports of goods. The total of bullion and coin received in England from South Africa in 1926 was $153,240,012, and in 1927, $124,347,597.

TARIFF BARRIERS NO ARGUMENT

It is said that tariff barriers against Europe increase the difficulty of their payment. Have we failed to increase our purchases from foreign countries since the commission commenced its work? If you compare the year 1926 with the year 1922, the date of the passage of the present tariff law, we imported in the later year (1926) from European countries and their dependencies $1,308,000,000 more than in the earlier year (1922), an increase of 92 per cent. On the other hand, our exports in the same period to those countries only increased by 22 per cent.

GOOD SHARE OF DEBTS INCURRED AFTER THE ARMISTICE

One very important fact is overlooked, and that is that a good share of these debts, three-tenths at least, was incurred after the armistice, and thus after the threat of war was removed. Indeed, out of the 13 nations with which the Debt Commission has made settlements only 5—Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and Yugoslavia—borrowed from us before the armistice. The amounts advanced after the armistice were largely for rehabilitation and for improvement. Certainly no one can fairly claim that this postarmistice debt should be placed on the same footing with the rest or that it should be repudiated. Let us cite an illustration of the condition created by this fact: France, which is hesitating to ratify the agreement made by her ambassador and approved by her cabinet, received $1,970,000,000 before the armistice of November 11, 1918, a good share of which was not for munitions or for the prosecution of the war. She received $1,370,000,000 after the armistice. The proportion between the two is about that of 3 : 2. If interest were to be computed on the postarmistice advances of $1,370,000,000 at 5 per cent, which is a low rate in Europe at this time, the present worth would almost exactly equal the amount that it is proposed France shall pay. In addition, it must be stated that part of this postarmistice amount was for supplies sold to France, and, presumably, part of these supplies at least were resold at a profit. The amount to be paid for such supplies was $407,000,000, on which they are now paying 5 per cent interest, with a promise to pay the principal in 1929. The amount that they must pay in 1929 is greater than their total payments for nine years under the debt settlement.

REPUDIATION WILL NOT BRING RESTORATION

I have thus given many facts and figures, because they are necessary for an adequate understanding of the situation. The road to rejuvenation of Europe is not by the releasing of these debts. It depends upon the burying of their hatreds, removing asperities, the creation of a spirit of peace and good will, more favorable trade arrangements. Such is the path to prosperity and a better Europe. The future is within their own control; restoration will not result from the repudiation of their obligations.

[1] Time of payment of principal and interest extended to June 1, 1943, by authority of joint resolution of Congress approved Apr. 6, 1922.

[2] Difference between principal of funded debt and amount here stated represents deferred payments provided for in the funding agreements, for which old bonds of the respective debtor governments have been or will be delivered to the Treasury.

[3] Accrued and unpaid interest on funded debts due to exercise of options to pay specified amounts over first 5 years in lieu of total amounts due for which bonds similar to those originally issued under funding agreement will be given upon expiration of the option for the full amount then due.

[4] Funding agreement not yet ratified by either France or the United States.

[5] Upon ratification of the funding agreement, $10,030,307.73 of this sum will be applied toward payment of the first annuities due thereunder.

[6] Upon ratification of the debt agreement $60,772,833.63 of this sum will be applied toward payment of the first annuities due thereunder.

[7] Increase over amount funded due to exercise of options to pay one-half of interest due on original issue of bonds in bonds of debtor government.

[8] Represents proceeds of liquidation of financial affairs of Russian Government in this country (copies of letter dated May 23, 1922, from the Secretary of State and of reply of the Secretary of the Treasury dated June 2, 1922, in regard to loans to Russian Government and liquidation of affairs of the latter in this country appear in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, as Exhibit 79, p. 283, and in the Combined Annual Reports of the World War Foreign Debt Commission as Exhibit 2, p. 84).

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, as I have previously stated, this settlement with Yugoslavia has been recommended by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and favorably acted upon in the House, in the last session. But in view of the filibuster in the last session it failed of action in the Senate.

I wish the House to understand that it is not the most unfavorable settlement that we have made. In fact, this settlement is 6 per cent higher than the settlement with Italy.

And this, notwithstanding that Yugoslavia is one of the poorest nations in Europe.

The gentleman from New York in a measure explained how Yugoslavia was created. Yugoslavia has been created to bring about tranquillity and peace in the Balkans. It is composed of the Provinces of North and South Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Herzogovina, Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, Medjemura, Slovenia, Voyvodina, and the islands of Krk (Veglia) and Kostave. Its area is equal to the States of Pennsylvania and New York combined. Most of these little States or countries were part and parcel of Austria-Hungary.

It is a purely agricultural country, and although rich in mineral resources, due to the unfortunate conditions under which these people lived for centuries past, they have been deprived of developing them.

Yugoslavia has been many times invaded and subjected to attacks from each and every side as no other nation and peoples have been, and during the World War had suffered more than even poor Belgium.

These unfortunate people have striven hard to rehabilitate themselves and their lands, their little homes. I am obliged to concede that the living conditions of the people, as has been stated, are very low, but not through any fault of theirs, but due to the oppressive conditions under which they have lived. These people are all of the Slavic race, hard working, honest, and peaceful, and I am satisfied, notwithstanding what some gentleman has stated, that they will strive in every way possible to comply with the settlement.

These peoples, if left alone by the neighboring nations, within a few short years will greatly improve their condition, not only agriculturally but also industrially. It possesses tremendous deposits of valuable minerals, and as soon as they find a way for development they will become a prosperous nation.

It has been stated on the floor that a great deal of money has been actually advanced to these people, and some Members seem to believe that we actually advanced so much cash. I have been a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee during the World War, and I know they did not receive these sums in cash. Nearly the entire debt is for war supplies and food purchased in the United States, and most of it after the war when they purchased some of the surplus supplies and food that we could not sell to any one else for cash or to better advantage.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. CRISP. To keep the record straight, there was a credit of $26,000,000 which they could draw as they saw fit. I think, as a matter of fact, it was spent in the United States, but the cash was available to them.

Mr. SABATH. I understand it was first credited to their account, but was used to pay for war supplies, shipped or purchased for them, by the then various purchasing divisions in the War Department. Personally, I regret that, due to conditions, we were obliged to accept the settlements that we have with our former allies. But I feel, after all, even a poor settlement is better than a rich suit; in these cases war.

It has always been my aim that we should retain the friendliest feeling with all the nations; therefore, I have advocated favorable settlements with our former allies, but, unfortunately, it seems that those who received the most advantageous and the greatest help appreciate it the least; but I repeat, such will not be the case with Yugoslavia.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE EXECUTION OF CERTAIN INDEMNITY AGREEMENTS TO ENABLE THE COLLECTION OF CERTAIN MONEYS DUE THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10954) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to execute agreements of indemnity to the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., and the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa., and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10954) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to execute agreements of indemnity to the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., and the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to execute, in the name of the United States, and deliver to (1) the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., upon receipt from such trust company of $1,806, and (2) the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa., upon receipt from such bank of $16,676.71, an agreement of indemnity binding the United States to make reimbursement to such banking institutions upon condition that such banking institutions are required to make payment to bona fide holders upon presentation of check No. 358, in the amount of $1,806, drawn by Evarista Larravee, 50 Seymour Street, Providence, R. I., on the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., certified by such trust company, payee believed to be Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, Navy Department, dated between June 1 and August 29, 1922; and check No. 1000 in the amount of $16,676.71 drawn by Levin, Deluge & Kerschbaum, 35 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa., on the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa., certified by such bank, name of payee not ascertainable, date believed to be in calendar year 1921 or 1922.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this bill involves a very simple matter. In 1921 and 1922 the Government sold merchandise (surplus property) for $18,000 to the parties named in the bill. They issued certified checks for the amount due the Government, and they were duly delivered to the proper official of the Government; but in some manner, through some one's fault—I do not know who—the checks were lost. Now the Government can not collect them, because the banks say that unless they are given an indemnifying contract against the checks falling into the hands of innocent parties they will not make payment. The legal advisers have advised the Treasurer that it is doubtful whether they can compel payment without the indemnifying bonds. The whole purpose of the bill is to enable the Government to collect the $18,000.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This is the same bill that passed at the last session of Congress, is it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The same bill that was passed without deviation at the last session.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal on Monday, and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] may be permitted to speak for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table on Monday next, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] be permitted to speak for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally by myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally between himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is not my purpose to discuss the items of this bill from the standpoint of dollars and cents, as the money is appropriated to the various departments, but rather to speak to you about the general conditions existing in the District of Columbia. Under the arrangement that now exists Congress is, in the final analysis, responsible for the functioning of the municipal government in the District of Columbia. The municipal affairs are administered by the commissioners and through the various heads of departments appointed by the commissioners, but as Congress passes final judgment upon the appropriations, we, therefore, in the final analysis, have the responsibility.

I am glad to be able to report to you that, in my opinion, as a member of the subcommittee, we are warranted in saying as a general proposition that the public affairs of the District of Columbia are being efficiently and economically administered. There are two or three exceptions to that report, which I purpose to call to your attention. In the remarks that I shall make criticizing some of the departments I do not want it understood that I am offering this criticism for any purpose save that some arrangement can be made and some steps may be taken to correct the evils or the mismanagement that may exist in certain departments. If we are responsible for those departments that are not functioning as they should, we are also entitled to credit for the departments that are satisfactorily functioning.

At the outset I call attention to a few of the departments where I believe the heads of those departments are entitled to public commendation for their good work. The fire department under Chief Watson is being efficiently and economically administered, so that the city of Washington is receiving adequate protection. The same may be said of the health department under Doctor Fowler, and I would especially call to your attention the position of District auditor. The present auditor, Mr. Donovan, appeals to me as an exceptionally faithful and competent public official. Recently there has been a change in the office of the corporation counsel. Some changes in the management and administration of that office have been made. While Mr. Bride, the present corporation counsel, has been in office only a short time, from the record that he has made during his term, I believe we are warranted in expecting better service from the office of corporation counsel than we have received in previous administrations. In the office of the assessor we have a man who is entitled to considerable credit, and a little further along in my remarks I shall call to your attention certain difficulties that the assessor of property in the District of Columbia encounters, certain influences that are brought to bear upon him, undertaken to cause him to deviate from the course of his duty. The various penal institutions under the direction of Doctor Barnard are operating in a capable manner. Captain Whitehurst, who is an aide to the engineer commission, in charge of highway improvement, has mapped out a plan that I believe is logical and feasible, and is pursuing the work in good faith. Major Atkins is also an assistant to the engineer commissioner, and he is in charge of the purchase of land. The same remarks that I make with reference to the assessor's office may be said with reference to Major Atkins and his office. Perhaps I might as well go into that now.

It appears to me that the great indoor sport in the city of Washington is selling property to the Government and to the District of Columbia at an exorbitant price. That system and policy has continued for a great many years, and it seems to be so well founded and has existed over such a great length of time that the public generally and the press of the city of Washington are never heard to object. At a previous session Congress placed a provision in the law that in the purchase of land for public use the purchase price could not exceed the assessed value by more than 25 per cent. The assessed value in the District of Columbia, according to the report of the board of trade and other agencies, is 100 cents on the dollar.

Major Atkins experiences great difficulty in purchasing land for public use, although he is succeeding and through his efforts and the provisions of the amendment thousands upon thousands of dollars have been saved to the District.

Now, what happens to the assessor? Here is a man or a company of men who, looking ahead and finding a location that may possibly be in demand by the Government, have secured options, or perhaps they have purchased it outright. They go to Mr. Richards, who is the assessor, and ask him to increase the assessment; and if you care to read the records you will find there the names of the men and the tracts of land involved where the owners have gone to the assessor's office and have asked to have their assessments increased; and one man went so far as to say to the assessor, "If you do not increase the assessment I will bring a Congressman down with me and we will see about it." Let it be said to the credit of the Congress that he never appeared with the Congressman. When Major Atkins goes out to buy land through some agent with whom he has agreed upon the price and the agent says to the owner, "I have a buyer; we are ready to close the deal; you can make the transfer to the Government or the District"—the owner says, "No; if you are selling to the Government, I am entitled to more money"; and the owner absolutely refuses to go through with his agreement, even though he may be liable for the commission to the real estate man.

These are the conditions that exist to-day and have existed for many years. But under the wise influence of the 25 per cent limitation the people are gradually being weaned away from the idea that the Government and the District are legitimate public prey in the sale of land for public purposes.

The sewer division under Mr. Gordon is being well operated. I would not have you understand that in mentioning only a few of these public officials I am casting any reflections on those officials whom I have not mentioned. I believe, as I stated a moment ago, that with a very few exceptions the public officers and employees of the District government are faithfully discharging their duties. I am sorry to say that there are a few exceptions, and I want to call your attention to those exceptions.

The first department with which I have not been satisfied is the office of the municipal architect. It is not my purpose to go into details with reference to that office, as there is another committee of this House that is now investigating his office. I do not want to prejudge their work, and I presume that in due time they will report to this House, with recommendations as to what Congress should do, and as to what other agencies of the Government should do, should the facts warrant action by other agencies.

Let me call your attention to this specific instance: The District of Columbia is manufacturing brick at the Occoquan Workhouse. The evidence shows that brick can be delivered by the workhouse on the wharf at Washington for $11 per thousand, or perhaps less. The evidence shows that with 2,000,000 brick on the yards at the workhouse the architect went to a private individual and purchased brick and paid $18 per thousand; and when he was asked about that the only explanation he had was that he did not know those brick were there. But he is the municipal architect, responsible for this work, using from time to time brick from that yard. Even if he did not know that 2,000,000 brick were on the yard, it was possible for him to find out. That is his only excuse. Gentlemen, I am frank to say to you that I am not satisfied with that excuse.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Those brick the gentleman is referring to cost $11 per thousand. Is that a prison-made brick?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes; it is a prison-made brick. It is not sold on the public market, but it is used on the public buildings and for public use here in the District of Columbia, and they have been using it for some time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. An article appeared in the Washington Star a few days ago which presented a situation which in my opinion ought to have the attention of Congress, and that is this: Right on the edge of the Capitol Grounds, where this new building has been erected, my information is that the District of Columbia has purchased that building for the purpose of making it a house of detention. Is the gentleman familar with that situation?

Mr. HOLADAY. I am.

Mr. RANKIN. Please let us know what the District Committee has in mind to do with that?

Mr. HOLADAY. Leaving for a moment the discussion of the municipal architect, and answering the question of the gentleman from Mississippi, I will say that the present house of detention must be vacated by reason of the improvements to be made on the Mall. The commissioners are confronted with the proposition of securing a new location. They made some tentative arrangements with reference to the leasing for a year the new building that is about completed at the southwest corner of the Capitol Grounds. That lease has not been entirely consummated. The matter was presented to the committee after the bill was prepared by the subcommittee; and the chairman of the subcommittee, acting under the direction of the whole committee, was instructed to introduce from the floor an amendment expressly prohibiting the commissioners from leasing this building and using it for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill as reported carries a proviso to the effect that the building shall not be used as a house of detention, or any building adjoining or close to the Capitol Grounds.

Mr. EDWARDS. That will not be located there?

Mr. HOLADAY. No; that will not be located there.

Now, gentlemen, coming back to the office of the municipal architect, if the only thing that was objectionable or that was suspicious about the conduct of that office was the mere fact of the purchase for $18 per thousand of 2,000,000 brick, when $11 brick were on the yard, we might accept his explanation and say that it was an oversight or a matter of neglect. But, unfortunately, there are other charges that are being investigated by another committee which seem to indicate that in the buying of other brick the bid of the low bidder has not been accepted.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Were the brick to which the gentleman refers face brick or common building brick?

Mr. HOLADAY. I think the bricks to which I refer, the 2,000,000 bricks, are common building bricks used for backing-up purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bricks we are making at the jail are the bricks that are being used for school buildings. They are face brick.

Mr. HOLADAY. They are making both kinds down there and in these 2,000,000 bricks there are probably two kinds—face brick and common building brick. I am under the impression, although I do not have the exact figures, that a large part of the 2,000,000 in question were common bricks, but I do not have the exact figures.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know the mode of manufacture used in making the two different kinds of brick—that is, are they making dry pressed brick at Occoquan or are there two kinds of bricks being furnished, dry-pressed brick and what is known as stiff-mud brick, because there is a difference in price between stiff-mud brick and dry-pressed brick?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I am not familiar with the technical terms, but these bricks, I should say, are dry-pressed bricks. These bricks are what are known as face bricks, but they are not glazed-face bricks or anything of that kind.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Let me say to the gentleman that for about five or six years I was engaged in the manufacture of brick. As to common brick there should not be anything like the difference in price the gentleman has mentioned; but there is a material difference in the price of different kinds of face brick both in the mode of manufacture, colors, and so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. The brick the District is making at Occoquan is brick you will find in practically all of the District's buildings that are being built with dark red brick, and this brick is used as face brick.

Mr. HOLADAY. Let me say to the gentleman, by way of explanation, that in the matter now being investigated with reference to the turning down of the low bidder the brick involved were not from the workhouse. The committee has made some changes in the office of the municipal architect which we think will better the service, and we are awaiting the report of this investigation, which goes into matters that are beyond the matters we were investigating.

There is another office in the District with which I am not satisfied, and I am not satisfied with the manner in which it is being operated. That is the office of the recorder of deeds. There the committee has made certain changes and we have had certain understandings with the present recorder which I hope will bring about more efficient and satisfactory service. If in another year it is found that conditions have not been changed or remedied, then it will be necessary to consider further steps with reference to the conduct of that office.

The third department to which I find objections is the public-school system of this District. We are spending annually for the public-school system in the District some $12,500,000. I believe that on the whole we have a fairly efficient school system in the District. It, perhaps, will compare fairly favorably with the schools of other cities, but we are paying more in the District for our schools than other cities are paying. The statement is frequently made that we have the most expensive school system in the United States. As to whether that statement is warranted or not I am not in a position to say because no careful study has been made, but I am in a position to say that we are expending more for schools in the District of Columbia than is being spent in the average city.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. Are your figures based on the per capita cost?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes; I refer to the per capita cost. Of course, the sum total would depend on the population of the various cities, but I am speaking of the per capita cost.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Is the gentleman referring to the per capita cost of the school children, or what?

Mr. HOLADAY. Of the population or of the school population.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The school population?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes. In the long run it would be about the same thing. The only reason there can be for the condition that exists is inefficient management in our public schools. Let it be understood at the outset that what I may say with reference to the officials responsible for the administration of our school affairs that I except from that criticism Mr. Wilkinson, who is the head of the colored schools of this District. Mr. Wilkinson impressed me as a man who was absolutely fair and open with the committees; that he did not have anything to conceal; that he was making his recommendations fairly and openly and willing to stand by his judgment, but willing, if overruled, to adapt himself to the circumstances. Let me remark here that the District Commissioners are not responsible for the schools or for the recorder of deeds.

They are responsible for the conduct of the municipal architect's office, but they are not responsible for the other two departments about which objections are offered.

The schools are operated by a board of education appointed by the judges of the Supreme Court of the District. The members of this board, I believe, without exception, are high-class and responsible citizens. It is an honorary position without compensation, and I fear the condition exists here that frequently exists under an arrangement of this kind. The individual members of the board have not devoted as much time to the proposition as they should, and I do not say this by way of criticism, because they are devoting their time free of charge. And I also wonder if the board of education knows all of the details of the operation of the schools. I experienced great difficulty in securing accurate and complete information from Doctor Ballou, the superintendent of the schools.

Mr. CASEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CASEY. My colleague on the subcommittee has referred to the committee in these matters, and I would like to keep the record straight so that the Members of the House may understand that any expression he may make on these matters this afternoon is purely his own expression of opinion and that the gentleman does not speak for the committee.

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes. I want that understood. I want it understood that what I may say here with reference to these various departments is my individual opinion as a member of the committee. I believe it is my duty as a Representative of this House on the committee to report back to the House what I believe to be the conditions, and that is what I propose to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLADAY. I am not going into the details of the objectionable points in the administration of our schools, except to say that the Bureau of Efficiency has made an exhaustive study of the school system. They have reported the facts and they have reported their conclusions and recommendations. Doctor Ballou, the superintendent of schools, did not, as I understand the situation, seriously object to their finding of facts. He did object to some of their conclusions and to some of their recommendations, although his objections to their recommendations were more largely concerned with the period within which their recommendations could be put into operation rather than to the objections themselves. This report is now in the hands of the board of education.

Let it be understood that in the report of the Bureau of Efficiency and in our investigation, and in my opinion, no evidence has been found of any dishonesty or any misuse of public funds except inefficient management, and the inefficient management goes largely to the business end of the administration.

They do not have a competent and a satisfactory business organization or business director, and as a result of this, public money has been wasted and we have not received as nearly 100 cents on the dollar for every dollar of public money expended as we should have received or as we will receive if there is a competent business organization of school affairs. This is being gone into by the board of education, and it is hoped that a competent business management, receiving a proper salary with a proper organization, may be effected at some date in the not far-distant future, and a considerable improvement made.

I have not been satisfied with the administration of school affairs from an educational standpoint, and yet I realize that it is a difficult matter for one who is not an educator to undertake to criticize the methods of the teaching administration. I can only do this from the standpoint of comparing the results here with the results in other cities.

The Bureau of Efficiency points out certain criticisms along this line. Doctor Ballou admits there is some merit in these criticisms and that he is making efforts to remedy such conditions. Some changes will be made in the coming year, and he expects to make further changes in the years to come.

Gentlemen, on the whole I am happy to be able to say to you that I believe the affairs of the District of Columbia are being as efficiently and as economically administered as are the public affairs in other American cities. In making this statement I take considerable pride in the belief that Congress is entitled to view this record with some degree of satisfaction.

I am glad to have had this opportunity to utter a word of public praise for the officials who are so well doing their duty, and I hope that my words of criticism have been of a constructive nature and will lead to an improvement of service in all of the departments and branches to which I may have offered objections. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one minute in order to say on behalf of my colleague [Mr. CASEY] and myself that the gentleman who has just spoken merely expresses his own views. I want to say that in my opinion the school system of the city of Washington is one of the best in the country—economically and capably managed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Chairman, it is a heroic fate to die that others may live, and the noblest epitaph is that which says, "These honored dead shall not have died in vain." The sons of America have never hesitated to lay down their lives in the service of their country, and peace has its heroes as well as war.

A few weeks ago the Nation mourned the loss of the entire crew of the submarine S–4. Other submarines have been lost heretofore, but the circumstances of these men, entombed a scant 100 feet below the surface, hoping against their own knowledge of hopelessness, and perishing while speaking from their tomb, somehow made a strong impression on the mind of the Nation. The demand to know where the blame lay could not be ignored. Was there negligence? Are there any safety devices which should be utilized? These questions will be considered by a board to be convened soon. Their findings will have no effect on the crew of the S–4, and their contribution toward the prevention of future catastrophes remains to be demonstrated.

Last week my colleague Mr. FROTHINGHAM spoke in behalf of a resolution he has introduced and which he hopes to have approved, providing for the elimination of submarines by agreement among the nations. He cited the record of submarine disasters with which we are familiar and which therefore need no repetition by me. I think it can be conceded that no rescue apparatus can save a submarine if it lies submerged beyond the limit of depth to which divers may descend. Let us assume that this is even 150 feet, and considering the great depth of the sea, we can readily understand the hazard of submerging in any but shallow waters. Our naval officers concede the discomfort and danger of service aboard submarines in the request for increase in monthly bonus to men serving on such vessels, which is soon to come up for approval by Congress. I think we will all admit the increased risk of such service. But what then? Risk and danger have never daunted our men; indeed, many are attracted by these very hazards.

But Congress is responsible for the appropriations for the Navy, and therefore if we permit men to assume special risk we should be sure it is justified. If a submarine is a necessary part of a well-balanced navy, if these craft are indispensable, then these risks must be taken, for war is cruel, and until men outlaw war everywhere the price of preparation and security must be paid.

I am wholly in sympathy with the purpose of my colleague's resolution, and I concur in all that he has said regarding the ill repute which attached to the use of the submarine in attacks on noncombatants during the World War. If chivalry and humanity were the test of weapons, the use of gas and liquid fire, submarines and floating mines would be no more countenanced by civilized nations than sabotage or the holding of noncombatants as hostages. I am sorry to say it does not appear that the international agreement hoped for by my colleague will be brought about simply because the submarine is an unsafe, cruel weapon.

Let me make it clear again that I am in sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, but I want to submit my conclusion as to the only way by which such purpose may be achieved. Mr. Arthur Brisbane says that one submarine in war is more useful than a hundred battleships. If that is so, he is correct in saying that abolition of the submarine awaits the millennium. Usefulness in war is the test. If the submarine is useless, and such uselessness can be realized, the great powers will discard submarines to-morrow. Sir Guy Standing says the sea battles of the future will be fought with motor boats and high explosives, due to the use of airplanes, which can destroy larger vessels and submarines by bombing. Rear Admiral Moffett, of the United States Navy, says that the airplane in naval operations is at once a vehicle, a high observation post, a torpedo tube, a depth-charge projector, a mine layer, and a smoke-screen layer. Then it has been said the submarine is the arm of weak nations which can not afford a real fleet because of the greater cost of capital ships. I should like to have light on the question of the effectiveness of submarines in combat, either offensive or defensive. Between the assertion that it is indispensable and the charge that it is worthless in real combat, where does the true value lie?

Of course, we remember how the Lusitania was sunk by a submarine, but after that we ran a regular ferry of transports across the Atlantic and not one convoy-protected ship went down. Are submarines the bullies of the sea, effective only against defenseless merchant vessels? May we not determine these questions now?

We all do know the position Germany had attained in submarine design before the war. The great claims of Von Tirpitz for his undersea boats is still a matter of recollection. One great German submarine crossed the Atlantic and docked at Hoboken in the early days of the World War and long before our entry. We recall the trip of the Deutschland and how it brought to America many millions of dollars of valuable chemicals and dyestuffs. This was a widely heralded achievement, and much was prophesied of their future commercial value. All such claims have been disproven and oversize submarines are now not desired in the Navy. Might it be that submarines are also of little consequence in naval operations in war time—or are they extremely important?

During the war we heard daily reports of German submarines here, there, and everywhere. Thousands of tons of defenseless merchant ships were sunk by these craft.

Then later came the Battle of Jutland, and I am not aware of any great havoc being wrought by the submarines of either side against the great fleets of capital ships there engaged. Just think! With the fleets of the world to choose from—United States, England, France, Italy, Japan, the greatest battle armada in history—and Germany armed with so many submarines of long-cruising radius. Picture that situation and try to recall any regular naval vessels being sunk by submarines.

I am convinced that we should determine if submarines are useful as ships of war in any sense or merely piratical craft, to be used against noncombatants. If this latter case be true, they must be outlawed, and Congress must proceed to determine if it be true. I do not pose as an authority on the subject. I merely seek information.

On the 13th of January I addressed 12 questions to the Secretary of the Navy, and I am pleased to say that on the 26th of January I received a carefully prepared reply from Secretary Wilbur. These questions and the Navy's replies will be of interest to my colleagues, I am sure.

It appears that we lead the world in submarines to-day. However, as the useful life of a submarine is only 13 years, 10 of our vessels are now rated as obsolete, and every year more will become so; 4 in 1929, 3 in 1930, 28 in 1931, and so on through the years. We are asked to provide 32 submarines in the naval bill now being considered in committee, but each year we must replace those which become obsolete.

The annual expenditure for maintenance and repair of submarines alone was almost ten and one-half million dollars last year. Every dollar so spent is justified if submarines are necessary, but if they are foolish toys, then it is a terrible waste of money.

The Navy Department informs me that during the World War five battleships were sunk by submarines. In every case, however, these were old types, presumably lacking the modern ship's protective features. A complete list of vessels sunk is given, but these comprised monitors, sloops, mine layers, torpedo boats, and other lesser vessels—38 semicombat ships all told—as compared to thousands of noncombatant merchant ships, and not one single first-class man-of-war!

For the sake of conciseness I ask permission at this time to insert a letter from the Secretary of the Navy containing my 12 questions and the answers thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 26, 1928.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LINDSAY: I have received your letter of January 13, and take pleasure in forwarding the answers to the questions you have asked me regarding submarines.

(1) What is the comparative tonnage or number of vessels of the various nations with respect to submarines only?

The table shown below gives the submarine tonnage of various powers as of October 1, 1927:

Submarine tonnage as of October 1, 1927

	Built	Building	Appropriated for	Total
United States	84,722	9,000	0	93,722
British Empire	46,888	11,800	9,000	67,688
Japan	52,266	16,170	9,720	78,156
France	45,069	15,319	16,421	76,809
Italy	17,252	13,528	4,752	35,532

It should be noted that existing tonnages of United States submarines will become obsolete at a rapid rate in the near future. Thirteen years is the estimated useful life of a submarine. United States submarines at present carried on the Navy list will become 13 years of age as follows:

Date	Number	Tonnage
Now	10	3,852
1929	4	1,800
1930	3	1,044
1931	28	13,730
1932	22	12,614
1933	9	8,224
1934	4	3,504
1935	8	7,662
1936	19	16,292
1937	8	8,278
1938	5	5,820

(2) What is the annual expenditure for maintenance and repair, etc., of the submarine class of United States Navy?

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, $10,272,469 was spent in the maintenance, repair, alteration, and operation of submarines.

(3) Are submarines effective against warships and cruisers, or are these vessels protected by armor plate which is not penetrated by the torpedoes of submarines?

The torpedo from a submarine is effective against all types of men-of-war. The armor belt in the case of battleships does not extend much below the water line. For protection against torpedoes dependence is placed on two methods:

(a) Compartmentation in all vessels.

(b) Blisters in addition in the case of battleships.

Compartmentation consists, in brief, of dividing the hull into as small as practicable water-tight subdivisions in order to localize the effect of underwater damage. Blisters consist in a series of compartments placed exterior to the hull proper to limit the damage of an exploding torpedo. Battleships with the foregoing elements of design can probably withstand as high as four torpedo hits without sinking, whereas formerly, without this protection, two hits might cause sinking.

(4) Are there any instances available of fighting ships of any Navy having been sunk by submarines? Or any tests made on condemned hulls?

In the late war Great Britain suffered the following combatant-ship losses from submarines: 5 battleships, 5 cruisers, 3 light cruisers, 1 monitor, 13 sloops, 1 flotilla leader, 6 destroyers, 2 torpedo boats, 1 aircraft carrier, and 1 mine layer. In every case the battleship was of an obsolete type.

Tests have been made against condemned hulls, notably the Washington prior to her being sunk in accordance with the limitation of armaments treaty. Special tests were also conducted on the South Carolina.

(5) How many torpedoes are carried by a submarine, and may these be fired while submerged with any effectiveness?

Submarines are built with from four to six tubes from which torpedoes can be fired. The number of torpedoes carried varies from two to three times the number of tubes.

The most effective method of fire is with the hull of the submarine submerged but with the top of the periscope showing. This reduces the visibility of the submarine to a minimum while allowing the directing officer to see his target. A submarine in this position is said to be at periscope depth. A submarine may also fire its torpedoes when completely submerged by using special methods of firing.

(6) What is average cost of discharge of a torpedo in actual combat with the enemy?

The average cost at present of a torpedo with its war head is $14,000.

(7) What is effective range of torpedo discharge?

A torpedo is effective almost immediately after leaving the point of discharge up to the extreme limit of run, which limit varies with different types of torpedoes.

(8) Has the submarine any offensive status, or is it a weapon primarily of defense, considering the reduction in submarine attacks following the use of convoys of destroyers, submarine torpedo nets, etc.?

The submarine has an offensive as well as a defensive status, but no matter whether it be operating offensively or defensively it derives its importance from its ability to take offensive action against enemy ships. Submarines that operate locally—for instance, in the vicinity of the Canal Zone, the Hawaiian Islands, the ports of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts—would in general be said to be operating defensively, but the efficiency of their operation in these areas would depend upon their ability to attack vessels or fleets that were attempting to interfere with commerce or to bombard our shore positions. This kind of operation constitutes the defensive operations of submarines. Offensive operations are those that pertain to operations on the high seas or in enemy waters, where the submarine seeks to place itself in a position for attacking enemy combatant vessels. It is not possible to lay down any general rule as to which is the more important employment of submarines. Importance of the employment will depend upon the circumstances of the war at the time. Submarines of all classes can be employed in the purely defensive operations above indicated, but only the larger submarines have sufficient seagoing qualities to enable them to operate offensively in distant enemy waters.

(9) What is the average rating of effective fire or "marksmanship" for submarines of the United States Navy?

Submarines are not generally very efficient in their gunfire unless the sea is smooth. They can not fire their guns as effectively as surface vessels, except at very short range. Their marksmanship, so far as torpedoes are concerned, compares very favorably with torpedo marksmanship from surface vessels.

(10) Briefly, what is the value of a submarine as an integral part of a well-balanced navy?

The submarine is a very valuable element of naval strength, particularly valuable for operation in enemy waters since it can go to those waters and remain for considerable periods of time awaiting its opportunity for its successful attack of enemy combatant ships and to observe and report their movements. No other type of naval vessel can maintain itself in enemy waters unsupported for any considerable period of time, because it would be discovered and driven off by superior naval strength of the enemy. The submarine, instead of being driven off, can submerge at appropriate times and thus escape observation. There is no way for a surface vessel similarly to escape observation. You can very well see how disturbing it would be to the naval operations of the enemy if submarines were known to be operating in the vicinity of its naval bases threatening every ship that issued from or returned to such bases.

The submarine has a special value to a fleet in its ability to scout long distances ahead of the fleet without being chased off its station by superior strength of the enemy. When it comes to fleet action, the submarine is a weapon of opportunity. There is no assurance that the submarine in fleet action will be as useful as surface vessels, but in all the steps leading up to fleet action, the submarine may play a very important rôle.

The mine-laying submarine is of value in that, unobserved, it may lay mines in or near the entrances to enemy naval bases and in localities of enemy naval activities. This form of attack may prove very effective in damaging or sinking combatant ships; in addition the constant threat of such mine laying makes necessary considerable sweeping operations which serve to delay or occupy enemy forces.

(11) In a hypothetical case of having to choose between submarines and fighting vessels of a nonsubmarine type, would not the choice be for the regular ship? Why?

This question can not be answered directly. There are so many factors that enter into the decision that with one set of factors it might occur that the need for submarines would predominate, while with another the need for submarines would not predominate. It is impossible to foresee with any degree of precision all of the factors and evaluate them sufficiently to make a decision in the case. It will oftentimes occur in certain phases of naval war that the submarine will be the sole type of naval vessel that can operate effectively in the execution of the particular task in hand. In other cases the usefulness of the submarine may be distinctly less than the usefulness of surface vessels. In general, a fleet must be built up and organized for the general exercise of sea power. It must be composed of vessels that are indicated by long study of the general world situation, of naval aims, and naval dangers. Such studies and estimates have led the Navy Department to submit for the consideration of the President and Congress a building program that represents the best professional opinion of the Navy. This program includes both surface and submarine vessels.

(12) What is the advantage of a large submarine of possibly 300 feet over all, as compared with one only 150 feet over all?

The advantage of a large submarine as compared with a small one is that the area of its operations is not limited to local areas. The small submarine is by its very nature restricted to operations in the vicinity of bases and ports of the United States. It can not go long distances at sea and remain in strategic positions for considerable periods of time. Its cruising radius is so restricted that it must remain near sources from which it may replenish its fuel, its provisions, and where it may rest its personnel. The small submarine is, of course, much more uncomfortable for the personnel and wears them out quicker than the larger and more comfortable submarines.

The special situation of the United States in the matter of bases makes it necessary for us to build vessels that can cruise long distances at sea. This necessity applies with as much force to submarines as to surface vessels. Notwithstanding the necessity we are under, all nations building what might be called the larger class of submarines, we recognize that the larger the submarine the more it costs and consequently the fewer vessels we can get for a given expenditure. Our effort, therefore, in design is to keep the displacement of individual vessels as low as possible while still incorporating in them the necessary strategic and tactical qualities. This effort has resulted in a design of a vessel well below 2,000 tons.

Sincerely yours,

CURTIS D. WILBUR.

Hon. GEORGE W. LINDSAY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, gentlemen, I would be presumptious if I stated categorically that submarines are ineffective in combat and useless in offensive or defensive operations. I am not an authority on fleet maneuvers or naval strategy. Our people will support any plan that seeks to lessen the horrors of war on land or sea, so long as that plan does not imperil our national defense. Military and naval warfare is changing. The battle of the Merrimac and the Monitor marked the end of wooden warships of all classes. The development of the naval aircraft carriers may mark the end of the submarine.

I am in favor of preparedness. I want our Navy always efficient as to complement of men and classification of types of ships. I want our navy yards ready with equipment and trained mechanics. But I would not want to maintain a type of ship which is of doubtful effectiveness in service, especially when such ships so often become coffins for their brave crews.

My point is that since capital ships with low gun elevation have become obsolete largely because "spotting" airplanes permit them to be outranged, so, perhaps, airplanes make certain the passing of the submarine. If I am correctly informed, every American cruiser and battleship carries three planes. Only one British ship carries planes, the Vindictive, which carries six. Of course, this does not apply to additional planes carried by airplane carriers in much greater number. Ships like the U. S. S. Langley and the U. S. S. Saratoga carry a veritable fleet of airplanes. But battleships and carriers are already limited to agreed ratio under the naval limitation treaty. It is, therefore, in the submarine and cruiser class that the possibility of a race in naval armament lies. It is difficult to give any comparison of the submarine strength of nations because of the obsolescence element previously mentioned. Any such comparison would depend largely on the age of vessels included.

An idea of what each nation would relinquish in an agreement to eliminate submarines is roughly indicated in the following table, as of October, 1927:

Submarines of all classes

1. United States	56
2. Japan	49
3. Great Britain	35
4. France	22
5. Italy	9

Since the size and importance of these boats vary, let us examine the table of total tonnages:

	Tons
1. United States	84,722
2. Japan	52,266
3. Great Britain	46,888
4. France	45,069
5. Italy	17,252

If present plans for additional building are carried out, these totals will again change:

	Tons
1. United States	93,722
2. Japan	78,156
3. France	76,809
4. Great Britain	67,688
5. Italy	35,532

It might be of interest in passing to refer to Germany's position. Her once mighty fleet of submarines is now reduced to eight old obsolete boats, six of which are kept in commission under the treaty limiting her arms. But it may be that the money that would have been spent on submarines will be used to advantage in restoring her merchant marine, so Germany may console herself with the thought that Providence moves in a mysterious way its wonders to perform.

Gentlemen, I am not one of those who lack confidence in our naval officers. I can not forget their many acts of skill and heroism. Paul Jones, Farragut, Perry, Dewey, and Hobson, and Gridley of "You may fire when ready" fame; and those many competent men in our World War whose names I shall not mention now because I would have difficulty in limiting myself to any select list—all carried on the traditions of the Navy. Officers and men, they go wherever duty requires. They obey orders. They will fight in tin tubs if necessary, but if that be not necessary, let us find out.

If we ask men to risk their lives in service aboard submarines, let us be sure the submarine is a legitimate member of the fleet and not a false pretender, unfit to ride at anchor beside the proud and honest man-of-war. I know the officers and men will give all that is in them, but has the submarine anything to give in combat from which unarmed noncombatants are removed?

Its little guns are pea shooters against the armored sides of ships of the line. Their marksmanship is uncertain in any seaway. On the surface they are doomed by the swift destroyer and submerged they are shattered by the depth bomb. Their vulnerability is their weakness, but in what is their strength?

They carry a limited number of torpedoes—a maximum of 18 and a minimum of 8 perhaps. When these are fired the submarine is out of action. They must get close to their target to insure a hit, because of limited number of torpedoes carried. Destroyers or watchful airplanes prevent them from showing their periscopes. So the difficulty of sighting the target is increased. Because of compartmentation of warships, many direct hits must be made before the ship sinks. Can it be done? I would like to know if a submarine could risk an attack on any modern naval vessel of fighting rank.

If the submarine is used principally to attack noncombatants—and such appears to have been the case in the great test of the World War—then it must be outlawed for such warfare is reprehensible and wholly violates the guaranteed rights of noncombatants. If it is obsolete as a type because of development of bombing and scouting planes, then it must go for less humane, but perhaps more persuasive reasons.

In any case, the submarine is prominently before us. Let us determine the facts fairly and conclusively and act with the courage of our convictions, so they who perished off Provincetown shall not have died in vain. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK].

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a number of documents, tables, and compilations of figures that are incident to and really a part of what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in the time allotted me I shall discuss the much-heralded and talked-of prosperity throughout the country. I am going to measure prosperity as reflected in the business conditions of the country. I shall apply the business yardstick to Harding normalcy and Coolidge prosperity. The President in his message says—> that the country as a whole has had a prosperity never exceeded.

The Secretary of the Treasury speaks of the steady employment of labor, that the country has been prosperous, and business and industry are stable. The press of the country tells us that we have had a great prosperity in 1927. It is proclaimed from the floor of this House by many of the administration followers. Stocks on the exchanges have gone up by leaps and bounds. My contention is that the claim of general prosperity is not sustained by the record. Speculative and inflated values in the gambling of stocks is an artificial prosperity and does not represent prosperity among the various classes of the people.

What is prosperity anyway? The Standard Dictionary defines prosperous as—> successful; flourishing; favoring; auspicious; fortunate; happy; well.

I am going to take the saying of the homely philosopher, Abe Martin, as a measure in summing up the question of real and practical prosperity. This quaint philosopher says:

> Don't believe everything you read about prosperity. You kin tell when it hits you by feeling in your pockets.

I am going to talk about this kind of prosperity which affects the general public, the everyday man. This is the yardstick to measure our prosperity, because it affects 95 per cent of our population.

The President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the leadership of the majority party throughout the country talk prosperity. Yet when we come to the question of tax reduction it causes the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to find out whether we have, and will continue to have, this prosperity in the Treasury in 1928. When they come to feel in the Public Treasury "pocket" immediately the President warns the country that there must not be too great a reduction in taxation because the revenue will not be so great this year. The Secretary of the Treasury in substance says the same thing. Mr. Mills, the Undersecretary of the Treasury, warns against tax reduction because there will be less revenues this year.

Chairman GREEN, of the Ways and Means Committee, and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, each sounds the note of warning. Mr. HAWLEY says the automobile business has fallen off, railroad revenues are lower, and the steel business has fallen off. Chairman GREEN utters almost identically the same language. These gentlemen express the view that there should be small tax reduction this year, and the reason evidently is that there will be smaller revenues gathered from taxation, and, of course, smaller or less taxes means a deflation or smaller volume in business throughout the country.

In this discussion I have an authority for every statement made as to our business conditions, except as to idleness in the cities; and these statements are based on the best obtainable information, and which I believe reliable. Some of the statistics I have gathered through bureaus and departments of the Government and agencies of a statistical nature throughout the country, and through the financial journals and daily papers of the city. I have tried to fairly gather this information as to business conditions of the country, and especially with a view of comparing 1927 and January, 1928, with the calendar year of 1926. Of course, I have not been able to go into detail in each and every business and industry. The undertaking is too great. But I have tried and think that I have succeeded in gathering enough information as to the business and industries of the country that the condition, as compared in these two years, may be fairly reflected, and our present-day prosperity fairly measured.

I would not undertake to say that there has not been prosperity in some lines of business. If there were no incomes in the country, the revenues of the Government would be paralyzed. The Government had large revenues last year, but these revenues have been gathered from the few and not the many. A very, very small per cent of the people individually and in firms and corporations pay 90 to 95 per cent of the income taxes.

The prosperity of 1927 was confined largely and almost exclusively to a few units of big business. The greatest prosperity was in the stock exchanges. That was not a real prosperity, but speculative values in the exchange went far beyond values measured by earning capacity. Banks and insurance companies were prosperous. Chain stores did well. Automobiles and the steel companies made money, but were not nearly as prosperous as in 1926. Only to-day steel and motor stocks on the New York Exchange got $1,000,000,000 squeezed out of them—paper values, of course. For these stocks are worth just as much as they ever were. But this is a sample of exchange prosperity. A few weeks ago there was another tumble on the New York Exchange, and the papers said then there was a loss of from one to three billion dollars; a sudden and severe shock to prosperity—shadowy prosperity, not substantial prosperity!

In the mercantile world mail-order houses, like Montgomery Ward, Sears-Roebuck, and similar houses, made great earnings; but to my mind, this is an evidence of adversity rather than prosperity, because when times begin to grow hard and money scarce, the average purchaser with small means tries to make his money buy as much and go as far as possible. They forget the home merchant. They deal with the mail-order houses where they may get the needed articles for a little less money. The business of the home-town merchant declines, while the business of the mail-order or foreign merchant grows. Thus the prosperity of this class of business was built up or enriched in 1927.

THE FARMER'S PROSPERITY

Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of our prosperity, or lack of prosperity, I am going to first discuss the basic business interest of the United States. I am going to talk about the class of American citizens having the greatest number of any one class—the American farmer, who produces the real wealth of the country. He produces the things the people absolutely need. Then I am going to talk about another great class of our people and our citizens—American labor. I shall first inquire as to the prosperity of these two classes of business.

What has the farmer to show for his labor for the last seven years? What gain in that period of time represents his prosperity? Mr. Chairman, all wealth, all property in whatever form, save land itself, represents the savings from the labor of human hands in and upon the bosom of the earth. The farmer produces food and clothing for the teeming millions of the world. You may close down every factory, mill, forge; you may stop every railroad train; wreck every bank and insurance company; stop every spindle; close every furnace and factory in the land; and while the hand of progress would be turned back a full century the world would go on. It would live. He is the one man absolutely indispensable to the life of the people of the world. Destroy the farmer and you destroy mankind. If he should withdraw the products of his labor from the markets a single week the people engaged in industry and in the congested centers would be upon their knees hungry, and in six months the world would be naked.

The first of 1920 saw the farmer in better condition, with fewer mortgages and less debts, than at any time in our history. He was prosperous because the war had produced an unlimited demand for his products at high prices and good profits. What is the story of the farmer of to-day? Of the nearly 3,300 bank failures in the last seven years 94 per cent of these failures are in either agricultural States or parts of States supported by agriculture. His invested capital in lands in 1920 amounted to $73,000,000,000, yet the first of 1927 it had diminished to $58,000,000,000. His earnings upon this diminished capital have been only about 3 per cent. Corporate wealth has grown from $99,000,000,000 to $134,000,000,000, a gain of $35,000,000,000, and it has earned nearly 13 per cent annually on its increased capital up to January 1, 1927. Not only are the farmers in the poor agricultural sections of the land bankrupt, but many of the very best farming sections, with the richest lands, are in a hopeless condition. May I point to one section? The Mississippi Valley and lower Mississippi Delta are probably the richest and most productive lands in the world. In discussing the flood situation recently Representative JAMES W. COLLIER, one of the ablest and most conservative of southern Representatives in this House, made this statement, that not only was that immediate section of the country affected by the flood but that over 3,000 miles of railroad transportation had been interrupted; that the water had covered over 12,000,000 acres of land in 174 counties in 7 States. Let me quote his language:

> There are $770,000,000 invested in mortgages on land and in bonds and $45,000,000 are still outstanding of levee bonds. Now, its assessed value, so bonded and so mortgaged, aggregates $815,000,000.

This 12,000,000 acres of land, as rich as any under the American flag, mortgaged and encumbered for one hundred cents on the dollar of its assessed valuation. Is the farmer prosperous? Is he flourishing? I give you these figures from the Department of Commerce—forced sales of farms for the year ending March 15, 1926—delinquent tax sales, 24,000; foreclosure of mortgages, bankruptcies, and so forth, 99,000; total, 123,000. In 1927 delinquent tax sales, 29,000; foreclosure of mortgage and bankruptcies, 102,000; total, 131,000; an increase in 1927 of 8,000 bankrupt or foreclosure farm sales. Each farm on the average has a family of four persons, and each year it was the loss of home to at least 500,000 people. In these two so-called prosperous years 253,000 landowners lost their farms through forced sales, not to mention the very large numbers who deeded their lands to mortgagees or through judgment and execution sales. In two years 253,000 American farm owners lost their homes. In these two years more men were sold out of house and home than faced each other in the Union and Confederate Armies on the bloody field of Gettysburg. I do not know the value of these lands, nor the liability of the landowners. I have no way of getting this, but I do know that, generally speaking, the larger farmers of the South and Southwest were hit hardest and they suffered most from the low-priced farm products. It is safe to say that these 253,000 farm owners were probably the losers of more money than any other class of business men. At $5,000 a farm, their losses would be $1,250,000,000. At $2,500 a farm, which is a low estimate, it would be $625,000,000, or nearly double the bank failures for the same two years.

Des Moines is in Polk County, Iowa. I have before me a copy of "The Des Moines Register, Saturday morning, November 12, 1927. The newspaper Iowa depends upon." This paper carries the advertisement of sale for delinquent taxes, with the time of sale fixed for the first Monday in December, 1927. It is signed by Allen Munn, treasurer of Polk County, Iowa. The first paragraph reads:

> The following is a true and correct list of all lands and town lots in Polk County, Iowa, on which taxes for the year 1926 and previous years are due and unpaid, as appears from the several tax lists in my office.

This paper has 33½ pages, with five columns to the page, set in 6-point or small type, describing both city and farm lands for sale. It is too big a job to count the number of farms and town lots and to add up the amount of taxes. In the statement accompanying the paper it is stated that—

> There are about 32,000 pieces of land upon which taxes are delinquent, and, if you could get some one to total them all up, you will find it will run into the neighborhood of $2,000,000 delinquent taxes in this county alone.

I have counted the number of pieces of land in one average column and added up the delinquent taxes in this column, and taking this as an average it will run about 30,000 parcels of land and about $1,400,000 in delinquent taxes. This is from the capital city and county in the greatest corn-growing State in the Union. Certainly, the people of the capital city and county of this great agricultural Republican State must be firm in the faith of their fathers if they continue to vote for Republican success, and at the same time pray for deliverance from Coolidge prosperity and bankruptcy.

Not one farmer out of twenty in the last six years has made a clear dollar on his investment. Let us come to the concrete proposition of to-day. Step by step the farmer is slipping. Hogs in the early part of 1926 brought 12½ to 13½ cents a pound. The same class hogs to-day bring from 6 cents to 8½ cents a pound. The price of corn now is below the cost of production. The producer gets from 55 cents to 80 cents a bushel. The price of middling cotton is around 17½ cents a pound, and is below the cost of production; wheat may yield a slight profit at $1.16 to $1.28 per bushel. Oats are cheap, without profit. The rice farmers are all "broke," with rice at 85 cents a bushel when it costs more than $1 to produce it. The various hays sell from $6 to $15 a ton, none of it at a profit, and much of it at an actual loss. Cattle are bringing a profit, and for the first time since 1920. This is due to scarcity. The farmer is involved in debt, with taxes increasing, and the price of the fruits of his labor fluctuating from production cost to a severe loss. The future does not hold out the hand of hope to him. He sells in the open markets of the world. He buys in the most restricted markets of any nation. He sells in a cheap market. He buys in a high market. His sale represents the extreme low price, his purchase the high price.

A Tennessee humorist once said:

> The unpleasantness of the sixties put "Yankee Doodle" on the pension rolls and "Dixie" on her crutches.

Unfair, unjust, and discriminatory legislation has put big business on "Easy Street" and the farmer flat of his back in the bottom of the "ditch," helpless and hopeless. There may be a single ray of hope. The Agriculture Department on February 3, so the newspapers report, says that farm labor this year will be plentiful and at lower wages. The reason of this "back to the farm movement" is the collapse of business in the cities, and the manufacturing centers of the country have discharged a large amount of their labor. It is go back to the country and the farm for existence or join the idle army and the bread line.

In my own district, the seventh congressional district of Tennessee, in the very heart of the bluegrass section, in the basin of the middle division of the State, the assessed value of the land in the 11 counties has shrunk from 1920 to 1928, $42,000,000, or approximately one-third. Eleven counties lying adjacent can not be found in any State surpassing these in fertility and diversity—in production and diversity of production.

LABOR CONDITIONS

I shall discuss the labor situation at length, for in point of wages and income it is the greatest business in the United States. We all know that the "party of high ideals" and "normalcy" claims great credit for the preservation of the rights and dignity of labor. What is the condition of labor to-day? Probably not since General Coxey's army marched on Washington has labor been in so deplorable a condition. In great sections of the country labor is hungry and starvation faces it. In other places, unhappy, underfed, and homeless, large parts of the labor population face the world.

The coal miners of central and western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the northwestern section of West Virginia are in greatest distress. I have drawn you a pretty dark picture of agriculture. But it remained for the able and distinguished Republican leader from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] to draw a still blacker one for the coal people. In this House a few days ago, referring to agriculture, he said:

> While one of our great basic industries has been in deep distress, yet the soft-coal industry of this country is in even greater distress.

And the gentleman knew what he was talking about. This is good Republican authority and undisputed. A great description of the condition of the coal miners of Pennsylvania was given to this House a few days ago by the gentleman from that State [Mr. CASEY]. It is admitted that the mine owners are neither prosperous nor happy. The coal operators at the present wage scale say they are threatened with bankruptcy and that a reduction in labor charges must be made if the soft-coal industry is to survive. The miner's wage is now so low that he can not reduce it and decently support his family. Inquiry at the Department of Labor as to the coal situation shows it to be "very, very bad." Of the large number of miners engaged in the soft-coal fields, probably 250,000 of them are union miners. Soft-coal miners, union and nonunion, number about 625,000. A very large percentage of these are idle and unemployed. We have no export market for our soft coal. It is hemmed in at home. The result is financial distress, both to the operators and the miners. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury, who talks of marvelous prosperity and stability of business conditions throughout the country, this financial genius who has ascended the heights until he is probably the third richest man in the world, should turn his face to the outskirts of his home city, Pittsburgh.

The picture of prosperity greeting him is a gaunt famine's spectral brood in the shape of half a million miners, discontented, half of them hungry, shabbily clad, and homeless. And as Nathan said unto David, "Thou art the man," they point "the accusing finger" and ask, "Where is your prosperity? We are out of work; our families are hungry. The coal corporations have turned us out of doors to freeze and to die." No answer is made to them, and they look into the mysterious future without promise and without hope. "Man's inhumanity to man hath made countless thousands mourn."

This condition is not confined to any one trade or business or any one section, but it is throughout the country. When you tell the coal miner that he is having a hard time, the people who are boosting prosperity say to him, "This is local. This is only with you." If you tell the textile men of New England and the President's home State of Massachusetts that business is depressed they say, "This is local with the textile people." When the farmer complains—and knows—that he has had the hardest time of anybody they tell him, "It is only agriculture that is badly depressed." And when the sawmills are closing down by the wholesale they say, "Hard times are confined to the lumber and timber trade." In other words, they are trying to hold up and boost prosperity until after the presidential election. Communicable and pestiferous diseases are generally quarantined by the medical world to prevent the spread of the disease. The prosperity people right now are trying to quarantine "hard times" in each of the many classes hit so hard—trying to withhold it from the world until they can get by this fall's elections.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. ESLICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROMJUE. You have spoken of unemployment in the different sections of the country. I was wondering if the gentleman had observed that even here, within the shadow of the Capital, we are having bread lines. Three weeks ago, I think, this last Sunday morning as I came out of church on my way home, in passing the Gospel Mission House down here I saw a large number of men standing in the bread line waiting for something to eat. I went in and contributed my little mite, and as I walked home I was wondering how the people of this country could longer refuse to believe that there were bread lines standing in the shadow of the Capitol.

Mr. ESLICK. I thank the gentleman from Missouri for his suggestion. The scene he describes is right here with us, and he that hath eyes to see can behold it.

This is the Capital City of the Nation, where the Government pours out its millions in salaries every month, and yet we see the real-estate business with creeping paralysis; the general line of mercantile business is at a standstill. There is no prosperity here!

I am reliably informed that save for a few large and costly projects the building business is almost paralyzed. In the still trades, consisting of bricklayers, carpenters, blacksmiths, tinsmiths, painters, paper hangers, plumbers, concrete men, and allied classes of workmen there are 35,000 idle workmen in Washington City.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ESLICK. I do.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. As a matter of fact, we have the same conditions of bricklayers and carpenters and other building trades and mechanics out of employment every winter, no matter how good the times may be. Is not that a fact?

Mr. ESLICK. From the day Woodrow Wilson became President until he went out of office we did not have them in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. My dear sir, that is absolutely right; but we had a war on at that time. Four million of our men were enlisted, and if they were not out fighting for their country they were located in the camps here preparing to go, and there was work for every man you could get in those times. But it is not so during every winter in peace times.

Mr. ESLICK. I must object to the gentleman from Illinois taking more of my time, because I have a big subject to cover. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois concedes that I am absolutely right, that from the day President Wilson went into office until he went out, we had no idle men. But he assigns the reason that we had a war at that time. Wilson's first four years was a peace-time administration. We had the depression to contend with that was brought on by the war in Europe. The battle cry of 1916 was, "Wilson kept up out of war." If I am right, and the gentleman admits it, we had no idle men under Democratic administration either in war or in peace. [Applause.]

But as to the unemployed: Forty miles from here is the rich city of Baltimore. I am informed 75,000 people are out of employment there. St. Louis has 100,000 men jobless—they belong to the vast army of the unemployed.

But this is not the end of the story. New York is the richest city in the richest State in the Union. Unemployment is so great there that the governor has recently taken official cognizance of it, and has taken this matter up with the State and city authorities with the view of aiding the unemployed, both in the city and State. Remember this lack of employment and great suffering comes from the two most populous and the two richest States in the Union—New York and Pennsylvania.

But I am not through with the picture. If the newspaper reports are correct, factories and business operations are closing down, hundreds and thousands in every great city are without work, and especially east of the Mississippi River is this true. I wrote the Department of Labor for information that I might have it at first hand. But not a figure came to me. I am going to discuss this department a little later.

But through the Labor Bureau (Inc.), of New York, specialists in economic research for labor unions, we get a report as late as February 9. This report necessarily must relate to union men. There are 4,000,000 workers out of employment in the United States. Is this prosperity, when prosperity means to be successful and fortunate?

Four million men without employment necessarily go beyond any one line of business. It embraces many classes of employment. As early as September and October, 1927, many of the industrial plants were operating only from two to four days a week. The record is silent as to those working only part of the time. It is safe to say that half as many laborers are employed only part of the time as those completely out of work.

LABOR OF BIG BUSINESS

The Business Condition Weekly in its issue of January 14, 1928, contained a table of the 24 most important and greatest industries of the country. It compares the pay rolls of each for the month of November, 1927, with the same month of 1926. This table embraces other industries, but I have used only the 24 specific pay rolls of big business.

The table is as follows:

Weekly factory pay rolls

	November, 1927	Change from November, 1926 (increase (+) or decrease (−))
		Per cent
Automobiles	$8,691,000	−10.5
Iron and steel	7,345,000	−16.4
Foundry and machine shop products	6,267,000	−14.1
Car building and repair	4,968,000	−8.9
Cotton goods	3,849,000	+4.9
Printing	3,790,000	+1.5
Electrical products	3,496,000	−9.1
Lumber and millwork	3,239,000	−8.8
Slaughtering	2,185,000	−3.4
Baking	1,830,000	+2.6
Boots and shoes	1,823,000	−17.7
Furniture	1,676,000	−6.1
Hosiery and knit goods	1,583,000	+2.1
Pulp and paper	1,555,000	−4.3
Woolen goods	1,485,000	−6.7
Petroleum refining	1,445,000	−14.9
Tires	1,402,000	−9.8
Men's clothing	1,397,000	−5.4
Silk goods	1,132,000	−5.0
Steam-heat apparatus	1,005,000	−12.0
Glass	950,000	−9.8
Machine tools	845,000	−14.8
Hardware	784,000	−12.8
Agricultural implements	690,000	−3.1
Other industries	13,381,000
Total	76,723,000	−8.0

I also have before me Business Conditions Weekly issued on February 11. It contains four tables. The first relates to building in 37 eastern States in 1927 as compared with 1926. The first table shows the building conditions by sections of the country and measured in square feet.

The second table shows the classes of construction, measured in square feet; 883,700,000 of building contracts in these 37 States were made in 1926 and 850,000,000 in 1927, or a loss of 33,700,000 square feet or 3.7 per cent.

The third table under weekly "factory pay rolls" shows a comparison of December, 1926, and December, 1927, on the same 24 most important industries in the country, comparing for the month of November, 1926 and 1927. It shows a gain in 1927 of 6 industries over December, 1926, and a loss in wages in 18 of the industries covering the same period, or a net loss to labor of 6.6 per cent in the month of December, 1927, as compared with December, 1926, and figured on this basis, labor had a net loss in 1927 during the month of December of $4,247,694.

The fourth table shows a change in 1927 pay rolls as compared with 1926 in five of the most important industries. This is shown monthly. Automobiles gained in 3 months of 1927 and lost in 9, as compared with 1926. Iron and steel lost in each of the 12 months, and consistently. Its loss was 7½ per cent in January and 14.2 per cent in December. Foundries lost in 11 months and gained in 1. January it lost only one-half of 1 per cent, and in December it lost 14.7 per cent. Cotton goods gained in 11 months and lost in 1. The first month's gain—January—was six-tenths of 1 per cent and December was a loss of seven-tenths of 1 per cent. Its greatest gain was in July, 24.8 per cent. Lumber lost in all of the 12 months, beginning in January, 1927, with 5.6 per cent and ending in December with 9.3 per cent. These four tables are:

Building contracts by districts in 37 Eastern States

Loss in wages, December, 1927, over December, 1926, $4,247,964.

The trend of pay rolls in five important industries during the past 12 months is shown in the following table:

Per cent change in 1927 pay rolls, as compared with 1926

	Automobiles	Iron and steel	Foundries	Cotton goods	Lumber

Twenty of the twenty-four industries in November, 1927, paid less wages than in November, 1926. The greatest loss was in the industry of boots and shoes—17.7 per cent. The highest of the four making a gain was in cotton goods—4.9 per cent. There was a net loss to labor of 8 per cent in November, 1927, compared with November, 1926. The combined pay rolls of these 24 industries for the month of November, 1927, was $63,342,000. Figuring the 8 per cent loss on the smaller sum for this one month, labor had a net loss of $5,067,000.

I have been unable to get any correct data on the pay roll of the entire country in 1926 and 1927. I understand it is not obtainable. The last report of the Bureau of the Census was in 1925. From the census of manufactures I find that the total labor wages of 187,390 establishments amounted to $10,729,968,927; 8,384,261 people or wage earners were employed in these establishments. The Alexander Hamilton Institute places the national income of 1927 at $103,400,000,000, and estimates that labor received from 54 per cent to 59 per cent of this great sum. It takes the figures 57 as the basis for the 1928 labor pay rolls, which is fixed at $58,398,000,000.

If this is a fair and correct estimate of labor wages, applying the 8 per cent average decline in November, 1927, measured by the pay rolls of the 24 most important industries, it results in a shrinkage or loss to labor of $4,715,040,000 from December, 1926, to December, 1927. It is a stupendous loss to labor in one year, and a great leakage from the prosperity gas balloon.

But this is not a fair average to labor losses. The 8 per cent and 6.6 per cent losses are an unfair yardstick. The 24 most important industries of the Nation did not feel depression like the smaller concerns of the country. The little fellow always gets hit first and hardest. His labor suffers most. If we knew the real facts, labor's loss was nearer $10,000,000,000 during the comparative time than is shown in the record of the big operators.

THE BREAD LINE

But back to my subject. I read this newspaper item:

HUNGER STAGES A COMEBACK

NEW YORK, February 9.—For the first time since the winter of 1920 and 1921, a bread line has been established in the Bowery. Thousands of men are out of work, and the numbers are being constantly augmented. Last week the Bowery Mission fed 7,202 men, the Rev. John R. Henry said to-day. Other and similar organizations are active, and some of the social workers insist that a crisis is at hand. If severe winter sets in, suffering will be intense.

It has been handed down to us that—the birds of the air have nests; the foxes of the earth have holes; but the Son of Man hath no place to lay his head.

New York City is composed of the sons of man, and verily they have no place to lay their heads.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that things have not always been well under Democratic administrations. Yet, sir, this country has never witnessed a real panic except within or as inherited from a Republican administration. The panics of 1873 and 1907 were during Republican administrations, and the panic of 1893 came in a Democratic administration, but that panic dropped into the lap of the Cleveland administration from the Harrison Republican administration, just as darkness falls from the storm clouds to the face of the earth. I have heard from the stump and in this House the story of the panic of 1893. We have been chided with the soup houses and the bread line and "over the hill to the poorhouses."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESLICK. Not now. Let me proceed. Let me say we had a hard condition then.

Hard times came to us in a Democratic administration. This unwelcome visitor was knocking at the door when the Democratic administration came into power March 4, 1893. That was a serious time indeed. Democrats marched from the bread line "over the hill to the poorhouse." But they did it with brave hearts and unfaltering faith. They looked the world in the face, poor but honest, conscious of no wrong, and with the greatness of self-respect. [Applause.]

Democratic administrations gave to the United States the most constructive legislation our history records. It gave to the world its greatest banking system—the Federal reserve bank, the Federal land bank, the intermediate credit bank—a great system. And had it not been for these—children of progressive democracy—business would have been wiped from the face of the earth in 1920 and 1921.

Yet with this great Democratic inheritance, nearly seven years after our return to normalcy by the Republican route, the bread lines are here; the soup kettle is on. This administration must put the salt and pepper in the broth, for it bears the Harding-Coolidge label. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESLICK. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. While the gentleman is touching upon the subject of soup houses, I desire to say that a few days ago I received a telegram from the treasurer of the Perry County Chapter of the American Red Cross at New Lexington, Ohio, stating that hundreds of children in that county were without food and clothing. I might add that in our State thousands of women and little children are facing actual want and starvation. Something like 75 soup houses have recently been established by the Governor of Ohio under the supervision of the National Guard, and they are giving approximately 5,000 little children one meal a day in order to prevent them from starving.

Mr. ESLICK. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for this statement. Let me say that when our brethren of the opposite party start over the hill to the poorhouse, they will find the present path hard to travel. They will find it slick and slimy, bespattered with the oil taken from the public lands. It was put there by and through the corruption, bribery, and prostitution of men high in public places. [Applause.] That pathway will have some markers on the mile posts. The names of one-time great officials, Cabinet officers, and of oily multimillionaires will point the way. One of them will have written on it the name of Fall, another Doheny, another Daugherty, and still another Sinclair. A great Senator, a great Democrat, a great American citizen, has caused the latter-day eleventh commandment, "Thou shalt not get caught," to be violated. It has been broken. It is shattered. Foul odors still linger. The private buccaneers and public plunderers have been caught.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESLICK. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. How many unemployed did the gentleman state there were in the city of Washington?

Mr. ESLICK. I have heard it stated as high as 65,000, but the best information I can get is 35,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the gentleman's other information as reliable as that?

Mr. ESLICK. Well, sir, I have gotten it from the best news-gathering agencies of the country, a part of it from your own departments here in Washington.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] offered to read a newspaper report. I know what the gentleman is going to read. He is going to read from the Washington Post of this morning, and that bears out what Abe Martin says, "Do not believe what you read in the newspapers"; but you "kin" stick your hands down in your pocket. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. May I read to the rest of the membership of the House the thing that the gentleman does not want me to read?

Mr. ESLICK. No; I can not let the gentleman read that in my time, because I have too many brickbats on hand to throw at you. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That paper is owned by a gentleman who was also involved in this slippery oil transaction to which the gentleman referred a moment ago. [Applause.]

Mr. ESLICK. I thank the gentleman from Texas. This is true.

I want to say a word about the United States Department of Labor and its Bureau of Statistics. In to-day's paper I see an article headed "Davis sees gain in unemployment." He says:

We have unemployment in the country. Everyone knows it. Why not admit it? As to the total number of people now unemployed, a number of estimates are going the rounds. My own guess is that these are somewhat exaggerated. The Department of Labor is now gathering figures to show what the unemployment total is, and as soon as these figures are ready the public shall have them.

Has it not always been the duty of the Department of Labor, and especially the Bureau of Labor Statistis of that department, to gather these statistics? Why have they not been gathered year by year? I have made faithful effort with the Department of Labor to get figures as to the unemployment in the country that I might be able to make statements at first hand and with the best—and what should be the most correct—available information. Certainly it is a very late hour that the department is gathering figures as to unemployment. The unemployed have grown in numbers for some time. Everybody knows this. I wrote the Department of Labor, Bureau of Statistics, asking for information of the unemployed in the country as of January 1 and February 1, 1926 and 1927, and in several cities. As late as February 7, 1928, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics writes me:

I have your letter of February 6, and in reply to same will state that this bureau has no record of idle or partially unemployed men for the dates you mention or for any other date.

This bureau, which should have gathered correct information is prolific for what it does not know or fails to let the country generally know. This bureau is being maintained with the public money, to gather information of this kind, and if it can not be obtained and will not be given to the Representatives of the people, then this bureau should be abolished or the appropriation withheld from it.

TEXTILE BUSINESS

I take it that it is unnecessary to make the statement that the textile mills were not as prosperous in 1927 as in the preceding year. The President, in his message, spoke of the great prosperity of the country, with only a few unfavorable spots. For a few moments let us visit his home State. From one of the newspapers I took a clipping headed "Mills to cut wages." It came from the great textile center of Fall River, Mass., and was dated January 20. It reads:

The Fall River Cotton Manufacturers' Association last night notified the textile council that a 10 per cent wage reduction would be put into effect January 30 at all mills operated by members of the association.

The 3d day of this month I picked up the morning paper and saw a headline:

Fire ravages Fall River—Flames start in idle textile plant.

And further down in the article I read of the great losses of the fire, adding this significant sentence:

On top of the industrial depression which was already being felt here, the blow was the most disastrous in the history of Fall River.

The President's own State is heard from at Salem, where the Naumkeg Mills, cotton manufacturers, and its subsidiary, the Danvers Bleachers, in Peabody, suspended operations on February 6. In Rhode Island, on February 2, it was reported that the Lonsdale Co., of Pawtucket, one of the oldest cotton-manufacturing firms in Rhode Island, announced the shutdown of the Ann and Hope Mills, due to poor business. The No. 4 mill of the same company closed the week before—suspension indefinite. In normal times nearly 1,000 operatives are employed in the two mills.

Passing from the closing down of specific mills, I want to quote from a man who knows the New England situation, and is familiar with the conditions of the textile industry in the President's home State. I quote from a speech of the junior Senator from Massachusetts, DAVID I. WALSH, delivered in the Senate February 3, 1928:

Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that it is impossible for me to give an accurate statement of the number of factories that have been closed in the immediate past. I am frank to state, however, that if the figures were available they would be startling. A very large number of factories have been closed, and an exceedingly large number are running on reduced time. I have seen statements to the effect that the textile industry is running at a production for more than a year of about 40 to 60 per cent of normal conditions. Unemployment, I regret to say, is widespread, and the situation in the textile communities throughout New England and northern New York is very bad, indeed.

Again, he says:

I can not find words to impress upon the Senate that very many of the textile industries, a large percentage of them, particularly cotton, although it includes the woolen also, are passing through a grave financial depression. The situation is most deplorable. I know not the precise words that would indicate the real condition. It is a regrettable situation—unemployment widespread, wages reduced, and the future outlook far from encouraging.

STEEL AND IRON

I have succeeded in getting reports on only six of the steel and iron corporations of the country; that is, as to the income before fixed charges. But I have been unable to get the total earnings or revenues for the year 1927. However, I think these are fairly representative. The United States Steel Corporation, the biggest of them all, the steel octopus, had a total revenue of $1,508,076,000 in 1926; I have no information as to its total revenue for 1927. It had a net revenue or earning in 1926 of $199,005,000; for 1927 its net earnings were $164,247,000, or a loss in net revenue in 1927 of $34,758,000.

Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, the third largest in the United States, had $15,149,994 net income in 1926, with $11,238,939 income for 1927, or a net decline of $3,910,985 last year.

The Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and a very large organization, had $304,362,000 gross sales and earnings in 1926. No report has been made of gross earnings for 1927. Its net revenues or earnings for 1926 were $45,405,000, and in 1927, $40,379,000, or a loss last year of $5,159,000.

The Republic Iron & Steel Co. for 1927 had a net income of $3,018,282, with $5,065,022 return in 1926, or loss in income of $2,046,940, or approximately 40 per cent decline in revenues.

Two companies reporting income before fixed charges show a loss. The A. M. Byers Co. in 1926 had $1,466,000 income and in 1927, $1,377,000, or a loss of $89,000. The Pittsburgh Steel Co. in 1926 had an income of $2,909,000 and only $2,438,000 in 1927, or a loss of $461,000. The loss in net revenues in the steel industry runs from a small percentage to 40 per cent, in round numbers, during the year 1927. The largest and strongest steel company in the world sustained the enormous loss in net revenues of $34,758,000. Yet despite this large reduction in profits for the year 1927, United Steel common on the New York Stock Exchange went to the highest values in its history. Its earnings were down 20 per cent; its speculative value advanced greatly. It simply shows that prosperity on the exchange is not measured by earnings. It is not a real but a fictitious or speculative value.

AUTOMOBILES AND ACCESSORIES

The automobile is playing a conspicuous part in the business life of the Nation. If any line of industry should make money, this line of trade should make it—and its allied interests, trucks and the manufacturers of automobile parts and accessories. But few of the manufacturers of automobile trucks and parts have submitted reports for 1927 now available. Of course, it is not fair to charge the failure of the Ford people to make the same dividends last year as in preceding years, because his cars were in the formative stages from the old tin Lizzie to the new car. The report of Dodge Bros. shows that the net sales of this company in 1927 were $173,581,526, as against $252,997,434 for 1926, or a net loss of $79,415,910 in volume of sales.

Of five companies showing the income before fixed charges and reporting, two of the five show profit. The Hudson Motor Car Co. for 13 months ending December 31, 1926, shows $5,373,000, as against the 1927 earning of $14,431,000. The Indian Motorcycle Co. shows an earning for 1926 of $212,000, as against $256,000 for 1927. The Marmon Motor Co. shows an earning for 1926 of $1,670,000, as against $1,240,000 in 1927.

The Nash Motor Co. shows for 1926 $23,346,000 as against $22,671,000 in 1927. The Packard Co. shows $15,844,000 in 1926 and $11,743,000 in 1927. The reports on automobile parts and accessories show incomes before fixed charges of C. G. Spring & Bumper Co. for 1926 $548,000 and for 1927 $319,000. The Continental Motor Corporation shows the earnings of 1926 to be $2,569,000 as against $1,756,000 for 1927. The Martin-Parry Corporation's earnings of 1926 was $518,000 and a deficit of $5,000 for 1927. The A. O. Smith Co. shows a profit in 1927, its earnings being $3,946,000 as against $2,029,000 for 1926.

OIL COMPANIES—COAL AND COKE

I have tried to get the correct information to make comparisons of the volume of business and earnings of a number of the big oil companies like the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the Standard Oil of Louisiana, Gulf Refining, and others. I have been able to get only one really large and two fairly large companies—the Standard Oil Co. of New York, Marland Oil Co., and the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. The Standard Oil Co. of New York had a net income of slightly over $16,000,000 in 1927. It had $32,776,502 income in 1926, or twice as much as last year's returns. The Marland Oil Co.'s gross earnings for 1926 were $77,608,000 as against gross earnings in 1927 of $56,322,000, and after giving effect to reduction in its crude oil inventories it showed a net deficit of $2,794,928. The Prairie Oil & Gas Co. will show net earnings of $2,500,000—slightly over $1 per share—for 1927, as against $15,968,000, or $6.62 a share, for 1926.

I have also tried to get figures on the big coal and coke companies like the Consolidation Coal Co., the Glen Alton Co., and others. The only information that I am able to get is on the Leigh High Coal & Navigation Co. And this is a pretty sad commentary. The net income of this company after the payment of all taxes and charges against it in 1926 was $4,177,446. Its net income for the year 1927 was $2,932,000, or a falling off of $1,245,446.

Probably in summing up the returns of the various lines of business and industry throughout the country to ascertain whether there is a genuine prosperity it would not be fair to charge the losses arising in the coal industry against a general prosperity, because this line of business has had serious and unfortunate troubles with labor.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

The Western Union Telegraph Co.'s operating revenue for 1927 was about $250,000 less than in 1926. The Pacific Telegraph & Telephone Co. had about the same reduction in operating revenues in 1927 as against 1926.

RAILROAD EARNINGS

The greatest prosperity of the country has been with the stock exchange. Then it has been claimed that the railroads were extremely prosperous in 1927. But 1927 compared to 1926 shows the railroads did not measure up and have received less gross as well as net operating income. I am able to get the reports of but a few of the larger railroad systems of the country, but I am inserting a table showing both the gross operating revenue and the net operating income of seven of the big railroad systems of the country. These are scattered in the East, the West, and the South. This table was compiled for me by the Standard Statistics Co., of 200 Varick Street, New York City. It omits the three last naughts in each instance, showing millions and thousands, omitting the hundreds:

Railroads

[Compiled from monthly reports January 1–December 31, as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission]

(Dollars in hundreds omitted)

Railroad	Gross operating revenue		Net operating income		Gross income (including income from other sources)		Net income
	1926	1927	1926	1927	1926	1927	1926	1927
New York Central	$399,538	$385,047	$72,158	$62,228	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
Pennsylvania	709,817	664,851	106,433	103,977	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
Union Pacific	205,416	203,892	42,100	39,483	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
Missouri Pacific	133,990	125,728	20,334	16,899	$23,955	----------	$8,632	$4,401
Atlantic Coast Line	97,158	80,453	17,559	10,274	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)
Southern Railway	155,468	147,639	35,529	32,765	41,386	$39,588	23,597	21,709
Louisville & Nashville	147,313	144,605	27,073	23,877	(1)	(1)	(1)	(1)

[1] Estimated gross and net income only are available at present for these railroads.

The Illinois Central runs for a thousand miles through the rich Mississippi Valley. At the close of the year 1927 it had only $12,131,871 available for dividends, a decrease of $5,018,527 compared with funds available for dividends in 1926.

W. B. Story, president of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé, says that he does not expect earnings for the first half of 1928 to be as large as a year ago.

Robert L. Nutt, chairman of the Seaboard Air Line Co., declares that the outlook for the current year is favorable, and predicts larger earnings, but he said the Seaboard Air Line's earnings, along with the earnings of other railroads of the country, showed a decline in 1927. He predicted future earnings upon the heavy movement of vegetables, citrus fruits, and phosphates. The vegetable and fruit crops of the South were destroyed in part, or as a whole, by the heavy freezes. His hope of greater revenue is doubtless blasted. Freight traffic on this line was 14.5 per cent lower in January, 1928, than in January, 1927—176,012 cars January, 1928, as against 205,806 last year.

The total car loadings of class 1 railroads in 1926 were 53,098,819 cars. In 1927 the same roads carried 51,714,302 cars. This shows a decline of 1,384,517 cars. And a further decline in railroad haulings, the week of December 31, 1927, revenue freight amounted to 679,600 cars, or a drop of 149,406 cars compared with the preceding week, and 54,631 cars against the same week in 1926. Miscellaneous freight loads for the week total 237,000, a decrease of 10,036 cars compared to the corresponding week of 1926. Showing the various items, there was a loss in shipments of coal of 29,885 cars; grain and grain products, an increase of 743; in livestock a decrease of 614; in merchandise and less than carload lots a decrease of 6,140; a decrease in forest products of 3,132 cars; a decrease in ore of 2,886; coke, a decrease of 1,761, as stated by the American Railway Association. It also makes the statement that the loading of revenue freight on the railroads for the week ending January 28, 1928, aggregated 902,832 cars, an increase of 18,737 over the preceding week, but a decrease of 4,147 cars as compared with the corresponding week in 1927.

Class 1 railroads for the first 11 months of 1927 had gross earnings of 3.3 per cent less than in the corresponding months of 1926. Operating expenses declined 1.6 per cent, and the net operating income of these roads was down 10.8 per cent. In plain English, the operating income of class 1 railroads for the first 11 months of 1927 was off one-tenth of the operating income for the preceding year.

LUMBER

Building throughout the country is at a standstill compared to the active and vigorous years behind us. Take the timber industry and lumber market—it is practically dead. I know by a limited personal experience in this business and after talking to lumber and timber men that lumber and timber are badly off. The better grades of hardwood lumber in the rough which a year ago were selling from $40 to $60 a thousand are now bringing from $22.50 to $35 per thousand. Bill lumber, or "bill stuff," as it is called by the lumber people—the rougher and cheaper lumber cut to order for railroad purposes—which brought $28 to $30 a thousand in the early part of 1926, is a drag on the market at $18 to $20 per thousand now. Crossties, first-class oak ties, were bringing $1.25 to $1.40 a year ago, and are now worth from 70 cents to 85 cents.

MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS

I can not go into detail in the various lines of business nor handle all the lines of industry, but only to mark out enough in the different classes, the pointers, to show the real conditions. "Charity begins at home." The income of the Washington Gas Light Co. for the year 1927 was $142,955.43 less than in 1926.

Going to the West, the Butte Copper & Zinc Co. for 1927 fell to $58,309 as against an earning of $194,524 for the year of 1926.

In our neighboring city of Baltimore the directors of the United States Railway & Electric Co. failed to pay the quarterly dividend of 1 per cent, or 50 cents a share, which in the orderly course would have been declared on February 15. The reason assigned by the president was that the dividend was not fully earned. The surplus for 1927 was only $1.17 a share, when the dividend disbursement calls for $2 per share. In 1926 the company earned its dividend plus $196,606. In 1927 it lacked $136,448 of earning its dividend, a difference of $332,054 in favor of the 1926 earnings.

Showing the lack of business and business activity, a Baltimore news item of February 4 says that business on the stock exchange at Baltimore—since the first of the year has dropped to comparatively unimportant proportions. Individual transactions are for the most part small, and few issues figure in the sales. There is an absence of that aggressive buying which marked deals a few months ago and which carried prices up to the highest levels ever attained. Even the surety companies have failed to respond to the excellent statements of earnings put out.

The Gould Coupler Co. had net profits of $52,118 for 1927, or equal to 30 cents a share on class A of its stock, which in 1926 it had $191,669 in earnings, or $1.09 a share. The earnings of 1927 were $147,551 less than the preceding year. The last, or fourth quarter of 1927, showed a net loss of $101,102 to this company.

As of February 10, the Sharon Steel Hoop Co.'s statement shows for 1927 nearly a 60 per cent loss compared with 1926. Its net profit for 1927 was $555,518, or $1.65 a share, as against $1,381,715, or $4.54 a share, in 1926.

The Canada Dry Ginger Ale (Inc.) had an income of $2,350,000 in 1926 and $1,736,298 in 1927, or loss of $613,702 for last year—approximately 25 per cent.

La Coty (Inc.) (powder and perfume) in 1926 had $3,341,189 income, and in 1927 had the smaller income of $2,043,484, or a loss of $297,705.

Under miscellaneous manufacturing I find in the group given by Standard Statistics (Inc.) a list of corporations giving income before fixed charges:

	1926	1927	Loss in 1927
Glidden & Co	$2,378,000	$2,205,000	$173,000
Morgan Lithograph Co	562,000	461,000	101,000
Liquid Carbonic Co	1,416,000	1,075,000	341,000
Pullman (Inc.) [1]	16,297,000	9,675,000	6,604,000

[1] The Pullman report for 1927 is for 11 months only.

This same company, under machinery and machine equipments for 1926 and 1927, and on the same basis of income gives these results:

	1926	1927	Loss in 1927
Torrington & Co	$1,545,000	$1,537,000	$8,000
American Type Founders Co	1,309,000	1,118,000	291,000
Mergenthaler Linotype Co	2,625,000	1,803,000	822,000

The Baldwin Locomotive Works, the largest of its kind, had an income of $5,883,907 net income in 1926, and $2,442,199 in 1927—a net decline in revenues in 1927 of nearly 60 per cent, or $3,441,708.

BANK FAILURES

I shall discuss one more line of business and then I am through. I want to talk about the banking condition and situation from the beginning of 1914 to the first of 1928. The bank is to business, trade, and commerce what the heart is to the human body. As the human heart takes in and pulses through the body the blood of life, so do the banks take in money, the liquid assets, and dispense credit throughout the Nation, through its different arteries and channels of trade.

Nineteen hundred and fourteen saw the beginning of the World War, the bloodiest tragedy in human history. Depression hit the country in the summer of 1914 and the early part of 1915. Yet the bank failures or disasters of the period from 1914 to 1920, both inclusive, are not comparable to the disasters of the seven years beginning with 1921. From 1914 to 1920, both inclusive, 227 State commercial banks failed or suspended with liabilities of $43,537,000. During the same period of time 19 State savings banks, with liabilities of $17,254,000 suspended. There were 34 State loan and trust companies to go to the wall with $20,248,000 liabilities. Private banks to the number of 113, with liabilities of $45,069,000, also failed. Sixty-three national banks, with $35,608,000 liabilities, failed. So during the years of 1914 to 1920, both inclusive, of all kinds and character of banks in the United States, there were 456 failures or suspensions, with liabilities of $161,716,000. This was the low-water mark for seven years, considering the fact that one heavy depression, due to the World War, hit us in the latter part of 1914 and the early part of 1915. This was due solely to the World War situation.

Permit me to turn now to the most appalling condition and the unequaled record of bank failures, not only in the history of our country, but in the history of the world. I speak from the record of the bank suspensions and failures for the years 1921 to 1927, both inclusive; I have before me a table of the number of bank suspensions and liabilities involved in the United States from 1920 to 1927, inclusive, the source being Dun's Review. This table of cases is not only by years, with the number of bank failures or suspensions and the liabilities, but I have had it prepared for the several sections of the country in the grouping of the States.

I am omitting from this argument the year 1920. This was included in the seven years just referred to and was under the Wilson administration. It is true that the Wilson, or Democratic, administration extended two months into 1921, but we take up the thread of the story in the first year of the Harding administration and bring it down to the first of the present year.

I ask permission to insert this table in the RECORD as a part of my remarks:

Number of bank suspensions and liabilities involved in the United States from 1920 to 1927, inclusive

This is a staggering and an appalling record of bankruptcies and ruin in the banking world. The record by years as to the number of failures and liabilities is as follows:

Year	Number of failures	Liabilities
1921	383	$167,849,555
1922	276	77,735,551
1923	578	203,738,038

1927	394	143,348,868

A total liability during these seven years of $1,164,840,621, with 3,296 the total number of bank failures. I challenge world history for a comparison with this picture of wreck and ruin and disaster in the finances of this or any other nation. I fail to find it, for there is no other period of time which has brought so much grief and sorrow to the banking world.

Let us take this record in another way. Let us group the States in the several sections of the country and see what the result is for the same seven years.

Group of States	Number of failures	Liabilities
New England	11	$22,938,031
Middle Atlantic	40	54,106,351
South Atlantic	477	183,643,581
South Central	489	161,050,920
Central Eastern	143	49,702,861
Central Western	1,576	467,661,503
Western	474	194,337,661
Pacific	86	31,399,703

Let us make another comparison. The seven years of 1914 to 1921 had 456 failures of all kinds, with liabilities of $162,000,000 in round numbers, and I shall give only the even figures. Four of the seven years from 1920 to 1928 each had a larger number of bank failures than the period of 1914 to 1921. The year 1921 fell short only 73 failures of equaling this whole period; 1922 had more than half as many failures; 1927 lacked only 62 of having as many failures as the first seven years' period given. In liabilities, the years 1921, 1923, 1924, 1925, and 1926 each had greater liabilities in its bank failures than the whole seven years under the Wilson administration; 1922 had nearly half as much liabilities; and 1827 lacked only $28,000,000 of having as great liabilities as the seven-year period under Democratic administration; 1926 had nearly one and a half times as many failures and nearly one and one-half times as great liabilities as the whole seven years of the first seven-year period. We hit the trail of normalcy March 4, 1921, and it has not been an even record in the last seven years. Consistently throughout this period the number of bank failures and bank liabilities have grown in numbers and in amounts until it was climaxed in 1926 with 608 failures and $212,074,999 in liabilities.

The burden of these unprecedented failures has fallen heaviest upon the people, or, rather, the class of people, least able to bear it; 94 per cent of the bank failures during these seven years were in agricultural States or parts of States supported by agriculture. If you will examine the map that constitutes a part of this record you will find that the agricultural and stock-raising States are those which have borne the burden of this misfortune. If you will go further into an investigation and go to the States that are part industrial and part agricultural, you will find that the bank failures have largely been—and I may say almost wholly—in that part of the State where agriculture exists and is the support of the local bank. You may take the great agricultural States grouped as the Central West, and take it year by year, and the number of bank failures and liabilities total enormous losses. In 1921, from this group of States there were 119 failures with more than $29,000,000 liabilities. In 1923 there were 291 failures with liabilities of more than $82,000,000, more than half the amount of the whole Union during the seven years 1914 to 1921. And in 1924 these same States had 304 failures with $112,000,000 losses, approximately three-fourths the record of the seven years just referred to. And in 1927 the failures were nearly half as great, with 239 failures and $70,000,000 liabilities. In 1926 the climax was reached, with 342 failures and $102,348,775 liabilities. These States alone in single years sustained losses from one-half to approaching three-fourths the loss of all the States of the Union from 1914 to 1921.

Let us now make a little further analysis or comparison. I have gone to the agricultural parts of the country for this comparison. I have taken one State from the West—Montana; one from the central West—Iowa; one from the south central group—Oklahoma; and another from the south Atlantic division of the country—Georgia. Georgia is the second largest cotton-producing State in the Union. From 1920 to 1928 these seven years in this great agricultural State show 201 bank failures, with liabilities of $73,019,484. Forty per cent in numbers and about 45 per cent in liabilities in one State of the 48 States of the Union compared with the seven years of 1914 to 1921. Oklahoma is a great agricultural State in the south central group. It had in these last seven years 154 failures with $49,487,659 in liabilities, one-third as many failures as the whole Union in the first seven-year period of time. Iowa in the central west group, the greatest corn State in the Union, had 289 bank failures with $112,377,042 of liabilities. This great agricultural State had nearly 60 per cent as many failures with about 60 per cent the liabilities of the whole Union in the period of the preceding seven years before 1921. Montana is a great livestock and agricultural State. It is taken from the Western group. One hundred and eighty-eight failures, or in round numbers 40 per cent as many failures with liabilities of $70,727,075, a little more than 40 per cent of the liabilities measured in dollars of all the States of the Union in the seven years, inclusive, of 1914 to 1920. Kansas, the greatest wheat State, had 150 bank failures with $34,442,609 liabilities.

These five agricultural States in seven years had 984 bank failures, with $340,053,869 liabilities, or more than double the number of failures and liabilities of the 48 States from 1913 to 1921.

In the face of this record in the last period of time, can it be said that there has been bank prosperity, and especially in the great agricultural sections of the land, which in point of territory measure from 65 per cent to 70 per cent of the area of this country? These are the facts, the undisputed record from Dun's Review, the greatest commercial agency in the United States. It would seem that any man crying a general prosperity would be ashamed to look a banker from the agricultural sections of the country in the face, and mention prosperity.

But to carry out Abe Martin's homely saying—the banker is not going to believe in the prosperity he reads about.

He has measured his own prosperity by putting his hand into the till of his own country bank in the agricultural section, and he finds that the money is not there, and that the much heralded prosperity for these seven years has not visited nor associated with the great agricultural people of the land.

BANKRUPTCY AND FAILURES

Let us go to the general business conditions of the country, as reflected by failures and the bankruptcy courts. I have before me Circular No. 15 by the United States Department of Agriculture, issued October, 1927, showing that 7,872 farmers bankrupted in 1925 and 7,769 in 1926.

I also have before me a statement from the Department of Commerce of date February 8, giving these tables:

First table

Business failures	Calendar years
	1926	1927
Commercial failures	21,773	23,156
Bank failures	608	393

Second table

Forced sales of farms, years ended Mar. 15 (approximate figure)	1926	1927
Delinquent taxes	24,000	29,000
Foreclosure of mortgages, bankruptcy, etc	99,000	102,000
Total	123,000	131,000

Third table

Bankruptcies as reported by the Department of Justice, years ended June 30	1926	1927
New cases instituted	46,374	48,758
Number of cases concluded	47,777	48,269

The third table also shows that 7,777 farmer bankruptcy cases were concluded in 1926 and 6,314 in 1927.

I also have two other tables prepared by the Standard Statistics (Inc.). The first one is based on Dun's Review of January 14, 1928. It shows the number of business failures in the United States for the years of 1926 and 1927, with the liabilities for each, and the failures are classified.

The other table shows the bankruptcies, both voluntary and involuntary, in the United States, with the amounts of liabilities for the years 1926 and 1927, and the classification of the bankruptcies.

I ask permission to insert these tables as a part of my remarks. I am sure they will be instructive:

Bankruptcies in the United States	Fiscal year ended June 30, 1927
	Voluntary	Involuntary	Total
Class:
Farmer	6,297	17	6,314
Wage earner	18,494	74	18,568

Total liabilities	$528,585,233	$356,972,102	$885,557,335

During the calendar year 1926 there were 21,773 commercial failures and 608 bank failures. In 1927 there were 23,146 commercial failures and 393 bank failures. The 48,758 bankruptcies instituted in 1927 carried with them liabilities of $885,557,006, or $80,000,000 more than the liabilities of 1926 bankruptcies. The bankruptcies of 1927 in liabilities were approximately $505,000,000 more than all classes of failures and bankruptcies in 1917.

The 23,146 commercial failures in 1927 represented $520,104,000 in liabilities; 1,373 more people failed in 1927 than in 1926, and represented $111,000,000 more in liabilities as compared with 1926, an already bad year of Coolidge prosperity. This is the record, whether it be business fortune or misfortune, happiness or unhappiness, prosperity or failure.

Turn to the other side of the account, and while the hundreds of thousands have been losing their homes and going through the bankrupt mill, while tax sales and mortgage sales are being made, another class in America—the few of the millions, segregated in the great industrial and banking and insurance centers have been growing in wealth all the while. Frank H. Sisson, vice president of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, as to the number of millionaire estates his company has administered in the last five years, gives—

1925	107
1927	169

One list is the antithesis of the other. As we have gone down the line from 1920, more people in numbers, with greater liabilities measured in money, have met their business fate in disaster and bankruptcy, while on the other hand, as represented in the administration of estates, the small class, representing the favored interests of the land—known as the millionaire colony—has had a large percentage increase, but insignificantly small in numbers compared to their less fortunate brothers in adversity and misfortune.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the President says, "We are at peace." Yes, abroad, except in Nicaragua, where we are teaching the natives the freedom of the ballot with bombs from the bombing planes. Where we are teaching the Nicaraguan the governmental lesson in the gunpowder doctrine that "Might makes right." [Applause.] Where we are shooting religion and morality into them with the machine gun. [Applause.]

Again the President says:

> Wages are at the highest rate; employment is plentiful.

I wonder whether the President would look a coal miner in the face, and himself keep a straight face, and make this statement. I wonder if he would go among the factory workers in New England, especially in Massachusetts, and begin an address to the textile workers:

> Fellow citizens of my home State, I congratulate you on your employment, the scale of wages you receive, and the great prosperity you are enjoying from your labors.

[Applause.]

Again he says:

> Some parts of agriculture and industry have lagged.

Will the President, or the White House spokesman, point out that part of the great agricultural field where agriculture has not lagged? Where bankruptcy has not stood like a black ghost among the great producers of the real wealth of our country?

I quote again:

> Some localities have suffered from storm and flood.

Yes, Mr. President, suffered as no people have heretofore suffered; and what has your administration offered to the flood sufferers in rehabilitation, except to try to put an additional unbearable burden upon those already weighted down and hopelessly in debt?

Again he says:

> But such losses have been absorbed without serious detriment to our great economic structure.

This was not the absorption of our bankruptcies and failures in 1927 aggregating $885,000,000.

The climax of the last sentence of the first paragraph of the President's message to this Congress is:

> If the people maintain that confidence which they are entitled to have in themselves, in each other, and in America, a comfortable prosperity will continue.

The people—the American people—do have an abiding confidence in themselves, in each other, and in America, because they are the king makers; the people are the Nation; they make and unmake Presidents and administrations. They have an abiding confidence in themselves, but not that comfortable prosperity will continue, because present-day prosperity is a special prosperity, blessing the few at the expense of the many. If this one-sided prosperity is to continue, the few are to become richer and the many still poorer. The country at large has had neither a comfortable nor a general prosperity.

There is more money in the United States to-day than ever before. It is not equitably distributed. Ninety per cent of it is owned by the smallest number of people and corporations than at any time in our history.

As a last word:

> I have told you in mournful numbers
> Republican prosperity is an empty dream,
> For business is dead—it slumbers,
> And Coolidge economy is not what it seems.

[Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half minute just to call the attention of the committee to the article on page 18 of this morning's Washington Post, in which a survey of the police department shows there are 6,518 unemployed in the city of Washington as against the estimate of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK] of 35,000 to 65,000, picked out of the air somewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain quotations from the trades and from officials.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE WET ASSAULT ON INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, there was a time when the trade using industrial alcohol in constantly increasing quantities looked upon prohibitionists as the natural foes of their industry. I encountered that feeling when a few years ago I undertook to secure the passage of legislation for the reorganization of the Prohibition Unit. That effort finally eventuated in the passage of the bill in the last Congress reorganizing the Prohibition Unit and customs service, a change that is to-day—although it was opposed in some quarters under a mistaken idea that it might present difficulties for industries—a change that is to-day most heartily approved by every representative of industry that then opposed it, and so far as those are concerned in the enforcement phase of the liquor problem it is likewise indorsed.

But at that time, speaking before the Committee on the Judiciary, I said:

> Legitimate business does not need to fear effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. As Charles Edward Russell has recently pointed out, it was not fanaticism and sentimentalism that put over the eighteenth amendment, but sound, economic reasons. Prohibition aims to promote the interests of all legitimate industry, not to destroy. The idea of enforcement of the law must be made the first consideration and all lines of legitimate industry will benefit therefrom.

But the other day we had an example, a demonstration, of the real foes of legitimate industry that uses industrial alcohol, and from now on I think it will be clear to those who have their money invested in these great industries, those who have a responsibility for the proper conduct of those great industries, that their peril is not among the believers in prohibition—their peril is among those who are so fanatically opposed to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment that they are willing to embarrass and imperil any industry in order to hamper the enforcement of the law. That blindfold leadership, we might call it, that characterized the great wet assault the other day on the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment—this blindfold leadership that succeeded for the first time in several years in getting a roll call on the question of prohibition—succeeded in getting that roll call after they had personally invited and urged each and every one of their adherents to be here and vote with them.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I prefer not to yield just now.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman ought not to talk about them when they are not here.

Mr. CRAMTON. I see a few of them here.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is here, but the others are gone.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, I may be under a delusion, but they may read my remarks.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Was it not a fact that many dry Members of this House helped to get that roll call in order to put the wets on record?

Mr. CRAMTON. I assume that is the fact. I was not here at just that moment, or I would have been glad to help if I had been here, because I have welcomed for the last several years, as a dry, any opportunity for a real showdown as to the sentiment in Congress. My observation has been that Congress, since the eighteenth amendment became a law and the Volstead Act went on the book—each succeeding Congress is a little dryer in sentiment than the one before, and a little more devoted to the law and its enforcement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield

Mr. CRAMTON. As I say, I would prefer not to yield now.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman that we are now dryer than the Congress before, but the gentleman ought not to talk about his "wet" colleagues when they helped him in the last Congress in passing the Hawley bill, which could not have passed at all in a dry Congress.

THE WET LINE-UP AGAINST INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask not to be interrupted until I have finished my remarks. I am not making a prohibition speech; I am not making a controversial speech; and the gentleman from Texas is apt to lead me into a controversy. I wish to finish the sentence that I started: This blindfold leadership selected the point of attack that they thought would be most effective—"the poisoning of liquor, the murder of drinkers"—and they succeeded in getting a roll call that showed that they had a total of 61 out of 435 Members in the House. The vote was 283 against 61 on the roll call. Here are the 61 who supported the Linthicum amendment, the text of which I will give a little later:

Yeas, 61: Auf der Heide, Beck of Wisconsin, Berger, Black of New York, Bloom, Boylan, Britten, Carew, Carley, Clancy, Cochran of Missouri, Cohen, Combs, Connolly of Pennsylvania, Corning, Cullen, Deal, De Rouen, Dickstein, Douglass of Massachusetts, Doyle, Drewry, Englebright, Fitzpatrick, Gallivan, Gambrill, Glynn, Griffin, Hancock, Irwin, Kading, Kahn, Lehlbach, Lindsay, Linthicum, McLeod, Martin of Louisiana, Mead, Merritt, Mooney, Moore of New Jersey, Niedringhaus, O'Connell, O'Connor of Louisiana, Oliver of New York, Palmisano, Peavey, Porter, Prall, Ransley, Sabath, Schafer, Schneider, Sirovich, Somers of New York, Spearing, Tatgenhorst, Tinkham, Ware, Welch of California, and Weller.

To realize how slim a showing was made by the wet bloc on the issue which they chose in their desire to show what strength they could muster on a roll call, it is to be noted that the 61 is less than one-seventh of the total House membership and less than one-sixth of those voting. The vote was almost 5 to 1 against the program of the organized wet bloc.

VOTE AGAINST INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL FROM INDUSTRIAL CENTERS

How greatly the vote for a program that would have hampered, if not destroyed, industries came from the greatest industrial centers is shown by the following analysis of the vote, listing only those from cities of 300,000 population or more in the 1920 census:

New York City and Brooklyn, adjacent New York State, and adjacent New Jersey: Auf der Heide, Black, Bloom, Boylan, Carew, Carley, Cohen, Cullen, Dickstein, Fitzpatrick, Griffin, Lehlbach, Lindsay, Moore, O'Connell, Oliver, Prall, Sirovich, Somers, Weller—20.

Chicago: Britten, Doyle, Sabath—3.

Boston: Douglass, Gallivan, Tinkham—3.

Detroit: Clancy, McLeod—2.

Philadelphia: Connolly, Ransley—2.

Milwaukee: Berger, Schafer—2.

New Orleans: O'Connor, Spearing—2.

Baltimore: Linthicum, Palmisano—2.

St. Louis: Cochran, Niedringhaus—2.
San Francisco: Kahn, Welch—2.
Pittsburgh: Porter—1.
Kansas City: Combs—1.
Cincinnati: Tatgenhorst—1.
Buffalo: Mead—1.
Cleveland: Mooney—1.

Industry, take notice, such is the fanaticism of the wet bloc in their opposition to enforcement of prohibition, that of the 61 votes for their anti-industrial alcohol program, that would, if enacted into law, endanger many established businesses of magnitude in the great cities, such is the fanaticism of the radical wets that 45 of the 61 votes for that program came from our greatest industrial centers, cities over 300,000 population!

The other votes were distributed as follows:

Beck, Wisconsin; Corning, New York; Deal, Virginia; De Rouen, Louisiana; Drewry, Virginia; Englebright, California; Gambrill, Maryland; Glynn, Connecticut; Hancock, New York; Irwin, Illinois; Kading, Wisconsin; Martin, Louisiana; Merritt, Connecticut; Peavey, Wisconsin; Schneider, Wisconsin; and Ware, Kentucky—16.

In all, including these 16, only 15 States had any representation in that anti-industrial alcohol vote of 61. In no case was there the majority of the vote of the representation of a State cast for the Linthicum amendment. The vote may well be taken as reassuring to the industry, as well as demonstrating that the votes that menace them are right on industry's own doorstep.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That was not really a test on the dry sentiment of the House, was it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am afraid the gentleman from New York is going to get me into a controversial argument.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; I can not yield further, because I know that I would get into a controversy with my friend from Wisconsin. I can not even yield to my friend from Maryland, formerly a Member of this House, Mr. Hill, who happens to be present in the Chamber to-day, who, with all of his faults, never led the wets into any such quagmire as that roll call. Seriously, I want to speak about the interest of industry in what happened the other day, and what may be attempted again; and I have noted that most of the votes that were cast the other day in a way that would have crippled industry came from the cities where those industries are largely located.

Mr. GRIFFIN rose.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall finish what I have in mind, and then yield, and I hope that the others who voted as did the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] may read what I have to say as to the effect on industry of their votes. Nothing would have embarrassed the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], or any of the others who voted for the industrial alcohol amendment more than to have had that written into the law. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

INTRODUCTION OF POISON INTO INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not want to indulge in anything controversial, but I do want to ask the gentleman in all fairness whether he considers that the introduction of poison into industrial alcohol is necessary for the carrying on of these industries?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is exactly the text of my speech, and that will emphasize the noncontroversial character of these remarks of mine, that I permit the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] to supply the text from which I am to speak.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield this one time, and then not any more.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Wisconsin voted to recommit to stop this poisoning.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am glad the gentleman from Wisconsin is here.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman from Michigan think that industry has more right than human life?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is a question that I do not see is now before the House at all.

Mr. SCHAFER. It certainly is before the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As a matter of fact, to clarify the situation, the amendment that was before the House in the motion to recommit would merely have prevented supervision of denatured alcohol. There was nothing in that amendment that would have stopped the denaturing of alcohol, but it merely prevented supervision, and would have flooded the market with more poison instead of less poison.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall insert at this time in my remarks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to forthwith report the same back to the House with the following amendment: Add to the end of the bill the following as a new section:

"That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any deadly poisonous drug."

The effect of the adoption of that and its enactment into law would have been to indicate a policy on the part of Congress that would have been far-reaching.

DOCTOR DORAN AND LEGITIMATE INDUSTRY

The selection of suitable formulas for denatured alcohol is of paramount interest to trades whose industrial life depends on a treatment of this question that is scientifically correct. For this reason all of these interests hailed with joy the announcement last year of the appointment of Dr. James M. Doran as Commissioner of Prohibition. For many years they had worked in cooperation with the doctor when he was head of the industrial alcohol and chemical division of the Prohibition Unit. In the course of this collaboration they had learned to respect his integrity, which did not once permit him to deviate from his duties as an enforcement officer; they also were compelled to admire his thorough chemical knowledge and his understanding of the problems of the manufacturer who must have an adequate supply of alcohol for his factory processes. That Doctor Doran fully recognizes his responsibility toward science and industry is further evidenced by the fact that shortly after assuming the duties of his high office he appointed an industrial advisory council, to which are submitted all pertinent questions, not the least of which is the selection of suitable denaturants. A study of the membership of the council is illuminating, in that it reveals the wide range of scientific and industrial talent that is at the disposal of the commissioner. The names and official connections follow:

Dr. Martin H. Ittner, 105 Hudson Street, Jersey City, N. J., chairman of the industrial alcohol committee of the American Chemical Society and American Institute of Chemical Engineers, chief chemist for Colgate & Co., manufacturers of soaps and toilet articles.

Dr. Harrison E. Howe, Mills Building, Washington, D. C., editor Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, the official organ of the American Chemical Society.

Mr. H. S. Chatfield, 7 Cedar Street, New York City, chairman industrial alcohol committee, National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association, vice president Kasebier-Chatfield Shellac Co.

Mr. A. Homer Smith, representing the American Drug Manufacturers' Association, vice president and general manager of Sharp & Dohme, pharmaceutical manufacturers, Baltimore, Md.

Mr. Frank A. Blair, of Household Remedies Co., 80 Varick Street, New York City, president the Proprietary Association.

Mr. Samuel C. Henry, secretary of the National Association of Retail Druggists, 168 North Michigan Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Frank J. Noonan, of Noonan & Sons, Boston, Mass., representing Barbers' Supply Dealers' Association of America.

Mr. Russell R. Brown, 110 East Forty-second Street, New York City, president of the United States Industrial Alcohol Co. and president of the Industrial Alcohol Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. George F. Dieterle, president of the Federal Products Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. C. Mahlon Kline, of Smith, Kline & French, manufacturing chemists, Philadelphia, Pa., representing the National Wholesale Druggists' Association.

Mr. Fred S. Rogers, Middletown, N. Y., president Flavoring Extract Manufacturers' Association.

Dr. Charles L. Reese, chemical director E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Wilmington, Del., representing Manufacturing Chemists' Association.

We have represented here the American Chemical Society, with its 15,000 members; the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry; the National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association; the Proprietary Association; the American Drug Manufacturers' Association; the National Association of Retail Druggists; the Barbers' Supply Dealers' Association of America; the National Wholesale Druggists' Association; the Flavoring Extract Manufacturers' Association; the Manufacturing Chemists' Association; the Industrial Alcohol Manufacturers' Association. Incidentally, also, the following internationally known business concerns: Colgate & Co., the Kasebier-Chatfield Shellac Co., Sharp & Dohme, Household Remedies Co., Noonan & Sons,

United States Industrial Alcohol Co., Federal Products Co., Smith, Kline & French, E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.

All of these men are familiar with and approve the denaturants used at present. Is it reasonable to accuse them of a fanatical devotion to prohibition that would cause them to take pleasure in "poisoning" their fellow man?

WOOD ALCOHOL A DENATURANT SINCE 1856

Ethyl alcohol has been denatured with wood alcohol, or as the chemist prefers to call it, methanol, since 1856 in England, since 1906 in this country. Mr. LINTHICUM is wrong when he states that this "custom has grown up in the Prohibition Unit." Every denaturant that is prescribed to-day by the Bureau of Prohibition has been carefully selected as the one chemical known to science that will fulfill the specific purpose for which it is prescribed. Mr. LINTHICUM states:

Some other denaturant can be used which does not poison the human system, causing death or ill health.

What other denaturant? Why is the gentleman not specific so that the advisory council listed above can have the benefit of his knowledge of chemistry?

What I am trying to do now is to emphasize not the prohibition aspect but the industrial aspect of the Linthicum amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the same question that I asked the gentleman the other day. Is he in favor of the use of these deadly drugs in denaturing industrial alcohol?

Mr. CRAMTON. And I say to the gentleman from Maryland that if my answer the other day could not give him a correct understanding of my attitude, and my speech to-day does not, then I fear that he will not understand my position any more than he now understands probably the most lamentable exhibition of weakness into which he led his forces the other day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think I shall understand by the gentleman's vote how he stands on that question.

WHERE IS THE DENATURANT THAT IS HARMLESS BUT EFFECTIVE?

Mr. CRAMTON. Very well. Fifteen thousand members of the American Chemical Society would be grateful for this information as to the harmless but effective denaturant. May I call his attention to the fact that the manufacturer of varnish, lacquer, solutions can not base his processes on the use of "some" chemical? He must know definitely what chemical and how much.

As it happens, practically every one of the 50 or 60 substances used as denaturants would be injurious to the human system if taken internally in sufficient quantities. What substance can not be abused? Gasoline has caused the death of many a housewife who used it as a cleaning material; but we do not forbid its use as a motor fuel. Illuminating gas has asphyxiated many a careless person; we do not exclude it from the home. Carbolic acid has been taken from the medicine closet in the dark with fatal results, but we do not prevent its sale. The most we can do with such substances is to label and warn; the careless and the criminal have always paid the penalty for their ill-advised or illegal acts.

During the debate the suggestion was made that manufacturers could use pure ethyl alcohol without the admixture of denaturants. The manufacturers themselves would be the first to protest any such arrangement for two reasons. Can one imagine the policing problem that would be created if pure ethyl alcohol capable of being diverted to beverage purposes were to be used freely around a factory? It would be necessary to assign a guard to every mixing tank on the premises. Even then it would be impossible to prevent theft of this seductive material. The expense would be prohibitive, while the morale of the working force would be shattered. Moreover, most of the denaturants are themselves necessary ingredients in their processes. For example, methanol.

There are two formulas of completely denatured alcohol, one of which contains 10 parts of methanol and the other 4. For purposes of shellac cutting, the formula containing 10 parts is preferred for the reason that the process requires the peculiar qualities of methanol. Pure ethyl alcohol would not serve the purpose. The same is true in numerous other cases.

NOT SO MANY "POISON" CASES AFTER ALL

As a matter of fact, the evil results of the "poison" denaturants have been enormously exaggerated. The statement was made in the debate that in New York City in 1926, 755 deaths were due to "alcoholic poison." The official figures are 759 due to acute and chronic alcoholism—quite different from "poisoning"—10 to wood alcohol, and 4 to alcohol poisoning. The 1927 figures are 770 deaths due to alcoholism with 14 wood-alcohol deaths in the first 11 months—the figures for the December wood-alcohol deaths are not available at the moment. Doctor Harris, health commissioner of New York City, stated January 4, 1928:

It is true that 770 is the highest death rate in the last 10 years, but it should be made plain that the deaths this year were not due to poisoned liquor but to the abuse of the use of liquor. In other words, the deaths reported were due to long-continued or chronic drinking.

Dr. Haven Emerson, Columbia University Medical School, sometime New York City health commissioner, expressed himself as follows before the American Public Health Association in Cincinnati last fall:

It has been suggested that the deaths from alcohol have been largely due, some people say even wholly due, to extraneous poisons included in the alcohol. If I am not mistaken, it was given to us by the authority of the Surgeon General's Office, or, if not by others equally qualified, that in the main, since prohibition, deaths and sickness from alcoholic drinks were due to the ethyl alcohol therein contained, for which the drinks were drunk, and not due to those occasional slight, moderate, or other additional poisons added to alcohol to make them undrinkable or coming in alcohol which has not been properly prepared to be served for beverage purposes.

Chemicals, a trade journal, investigated this situation very carefully last year; a compilation of the results is given. The information is comprehensive and authoritative. The investigator, with his technical training, calls attention to the difference between deaths from alcoholism, which were common long before prohibition, and deaths from "poisoning," which were likewise not unknown in this country before prohibition, and which are to-day reported even from Canada, a license country. No intelligent discussion of the question is conceivable without this elementary distinction.

"DEATHS FROM ALCOHOLISM" IN REPORTS OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS DO NOT NECESSARILY MEAN DEATHS FROM METHANOL—A NATION-WIDE SURVEY SHOWS METHANOL TO BE MINOR FACTOR IN BEVERAGE DEATHS

Beginning on page 17 of this issue of Chemicals will be found some "inside stuff" in regard to denatured alcohol, and particularly in regard to deaths attributed to this official Federal denaturant. Industrial chemists and buyers for the highly important industries using denatured alcohol in the production of lacquers, varnishes, explosives, etc., have held for months that reports of diversion of industrial alcohol into bootleggers' channels have been exaggerated, and that the many attempts on the part of alleged "statesmen" to shut off supplies of denatured alcohol from legitimate users have been little more or less than political "eyewash," since it has yet to be proved that the deaths from so-called methanol-denatured alcohol have reached any such total as has been claimed in the public press.

No less an authority than Dr. C. W. Muehlberger, State toxicologist of Wisconsin—he is connected with the University of Wisconsin at Madison—states in this connection: "It is my opinion that the addition of 5 parts wood to 100 parts of grain alcohol would not increase the acute toxicity for man above that which would be shown by pure grain alcohol in corresponding amounts. * * * In other words, I do not believe the addition of this amount of methyl alcohol would be a factor in causing death in man within a period of three days following the taking of large quantities of such alcohol. Such deaths, in my opinion, would be due to the grain alcohol. This opinion is based on the fact that it takes a larger dose of wood alcohol to kill than grain, according to the literature."

Chemicals has sought to get to the bedrock of fact, and herewith devotes approximately four pages to a presentation of the data relating to deaths from alcoholism, and, incidentally, from methanol-denatured alcohol, as collated by the heads of many State departments of health.

The showing is an amazing one when we remember the figures published in the daily press as to such deaths and the loud outcries from politicians seeking a little publicity by advocating the suspension of denatured-alcohol distribution licenses on the ground that the "Federal Government has entered upon a systematic distribution of poison to stop the diversion of alcohol from industrial channels into the hands of the bootleggers."

The facts as we gather them—and they will be found in this issue beginning on page 17—do not show any such outrageous preponderance of deaths from methanol—wood alcohol—as has been claimed by the congressional advocates of, let us say, "aldehol" or some other denaturant, that may "smell to high heaven" but which would have no mortal effects should it be used to prevent the illegal consumption of the alcohol which it "doctors" as a component of Gordon water or some brand of alleged "Scotch" whisky.

There are several facts which must always be borne in mind in the consideration of this newspaper-made problem:

And the first is this: That methanol or wood alcohol has been accepted as a denaturant for ethyl alcohol in the United States for the past 20 years, and for more than 70 years in Europe, and that there were no real protests until its use by the United States became a semi-political issue.

That in New York City—credited, unjustly or not, with being the wettest municipality in the United States—there were 29 deaths from wood alcohol out of 98 deaths from "alcoholism" in the year 1920, according to Doctor Guilfoy, register of the department of health; 6 deaths from methanol or wood alcohol in 1925 out of a total of 682 "alcoholic" deaths; and 10 deaths in 1926 of a total of 759 deaths from "alcoholism." This is not such a damning total as the politicians would strive to make out, particularly when it is remembered that there is no proof as to what number of "wood-alcohol" deaths could be credited to denatured alcohol.

There is still another interesting sidelight—or spotlight, as you will—thrown upon the wood-alcohol mortality statistics by the records of the Census Bureau at Washington for the years 1921 to 1925, inclusive. Here we find the amazing fact that the death rate per 100,000 actually credited to wood alcohol has not exceeded 0.2 per cent during any one of the five years, and that in 1923 the percentage was 0.1 per cent.

Similar data is presented from one of the largest life insurance companies, which seem to show that deaths from acute poisoning from wood or denatured alcohol in 1926 were less than one-third the number in 1920, which seems to bear out the contention of the chemical industry that the present outcry against wood alcohol or methanol as a denaturant would have been more firmly founded in fact had it been made five years ago, when there wasn't a peep from the politicians.

Chemicals holds no brief for the fraternity of bootleggers or the doctorers of denatured alcohol to be used as a beverage. It is and has been convinced since the Prohibition Department first began to shut off supplies of denatured alcohol from the legitimate consumer that industry was being hampered illegally and in direct contradistinction to the second section of the Volstead Act, which not only vouchsafed ample supplies of such denatured alcohol to legitimate users but sought to increase such use.

Chemicals has urged for years the distribution of such denatured alcohol under strict supervision, but under the supervision of chemically trained men and not the appointees of a national organization of booze haters, who may be honest but who are generally recognized to be ignorant.

Chemicals has always believed that brains and not bigotry would find an adequate solution of the alcohol problem in the United States—and still thinks so—and has collated the data presented in this issue for the man who thinks and not the man who "believes"—what some one else tells him.

We have gone to the fountain head—the data presented in this issue are authentic. We believe the industry is being hampered without rhyme or reason in securing a chemical of vital importance in the manufacture of scores of necessary commodities, and since the latest and most vicious attack upon the distribution of denatured alcohol has taken the form of attacks upon the Government and Government formula for denaturing ethyl alcohol because of "paternalistic murders" of innocent consumers, we have sought to present the actual facts as to deaths from wood alcohol from the only sources to be recognized—the official reports of the State and city officials having to do with the public health.

The facts are presented as given to us—we think they tell their own story!

MEDDLING WITH INDUSTRIAL WELFARE

Since my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] has come into the Chamber, I may be pardoned for reading the following editorial. I would not have wanted to read it in his absence. It is a little editorial from the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter, under date of January 16, 1928, and is headed "Alcohol opponents again display meddling ignorance":

In spite of the fact that the denaturants in industrial alcohol were not blamed by health authorities this year for the fatal results which followed overindulgence in holiday liquor, the fight against adequate denaturing has again been opened in Congress. In spite of the fact that he declared a year ago that he had no intention, in pressing his bill against so-called poison alcohol, of interfering with the rights of industries which need alcohol, Senator EDWARDS is again the leader in the congressional campaign to interfere with these industries. He has reintroduced his bill for potable denaturants.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If there are no deaths from this poisoned alcohol, the deadly poison that I had in my amendment, why did the gentleman object to such an amendment, so that the country might feel that it is free from a thing of that kind?

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall answer that question, and I think it will not be necessary to answer any more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman thinks that he can complete it with that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I think I shall.

The gentleman, with the same lack of ability to see, which characterized his leadership the other day, is assuming that my only desire is to kill folks. That is so far from the truth that I do not need to take time to answer it. I can not yield further. I want to give you what the chemists say who represent the industries who would have been put out of business if the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland had prevailed. I would not expect the gentleman to give much weight to what I might say, because he and I do not agree on these matters, but I think he ought to give heed to what is said by the chemists and leaders of the great industries that use 95,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol a year and that would be put out of business if the gentleman's amendment had prevailed. I read further from the editorial:

* * * * * * *

It seems useless to attempt to point out to certain folk the absurdity of an alcohol denaturant which would be nothing but an addition. But, not all Members of Congress, we believe, are in this class of voluntarily blind. Doubtless, enough can see that a denaturant must denature to prevent favorable consideration of the Edwards bill.

There is evidence in this bill that its author is meddling with something of which he has little, if any, knowledge. He purposes to exempt from the provisions which he proposes the use of noxious denaturants in alcohol to be employed in scientific research. He shows that he knows nothing about the purpose of such research when he sets about denying the right to continue the use of really denatured alcohol in industrial processes which might result from the research. Such manifest ignorance does not rid the bill of its possibilities of putting industry to the unnecessary trouble of opposing it, but it does present another weak point in the defense of the measure. The bill, in truth, is so weak that it could not stand were it not for the support which the fanatical opponents of alcohol will give any "man of straw."

IRRELEVANT INTRUSION OF POLITICAL ACTION INTO THE FIELD OF CHEMISTRY

Now, in order to show the feeling of irritated resentment of the chemists at the unwarrantable intrusion of the entirely irrelevant prohibition question in the field of scientific and technical chemistry, I also append extracts of editorials from the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter, the oldest and perhaps most widely read chemical trade journal in this country.

For a long time unthinking strictures on adequate and suitable denaturization have been broadcast by individuals totally devoid of knowledge of an intricate chemical problem. Can one blame the chemist for growing impatient? In the editorial they say this:

INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL IS NOT A FAULT OF THE PROHIBITION LAW

Tax freedom in the industrial use of alcohol was secured 20 years ago after a long and bitter struggle against the fanatics who will not admit that this useful ethyl compound is anything but a beverage. The act of Congress which exempted industrial alcohol from the revenue tax did more than perhaps any other one influence to make possible the progress in chemistry that has been made in the United States since 1906. The leadership which other countries previously had held in organic chemical production and in the application of chemistry to a number of major industries was in no small part due to their earlier realization of the unwisdom of taxing an industrial raw material. Slow to learn, because not industrially minded (no matter what names may be called in international reference to the United States and its people), this country, once the opportunity offered, was quick to take advantage of it. To-day it has the leadership which, handicapped by a tax on industrial alcohol, it never would have gained, not even under the peculiar advantages of the period of the recent World War.

To get tax freedom in the industrial use of alcohol it is considered necessary, in all countries, to require that alcohol, to be exempt, must be combined with other substances which, while not impairing its usefulness, will render it unfit for consumption as a beverage. This requirement is fundamentally a matter of revenue assurance. Its purpose is to prevent the curtailment of governmental income through the operations of crooks. It has no purpose relative to protecting fools from the penalty of their folly. Such a purpose is not the basis of law or regulation. It is in an asinine lack of reason, therefore, that a campaign has recently been launched, attacking the industrial alcohol law as governmental connivance in the slaughter of those who are so foolish as to drink denatured alcohol.

In view of the fact that the fight against industrial alcohol twenty-odd years ago was waged chiefly by the opponents of the beverage use of alcohol, it might be considered peculiar that the present attack has been launched by the opponents of prohibition. That is, it might seem peculiar, were it not for the fact that for unreason, illogical argument, and utter disregard of all rights and beliefs other than their own, fanatical prohibitionists are equaled by none but fanatical antiprohibitionists. Those who are behind the present movement to scare away the prohibition law, know that they do not tell the truth when they say that the Government (which does not do the denaturing) puts poison in alcohol to kill those who drink it; that the addition of gasoline to a denaturing formula places therein a more deadly poison. But what is such an immaterial thing as fact?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will ask for 15 additional minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 15 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I read further:

Toadstools are eaten by the unwary. Foolhardy motorists try to beat express trains to a crossing. Thin ice and deep water take their toll of the careless. Clotheslines are used by would-be suicides. Methanol was drunk 20 years ago as much as it is to-day. Freeze-proof liquid for hydraulic jacks, embalming fluid, horse liniment, and hundreds of other poisonous compounds were used as beverages long before the idea of prohibition had 10,000 adherents. Industrial alcohol is no more intended for internal human consumption than were any of these "emergency liquors." Its manufacture is no more contributory to suicide than is the manufacture of rope. Industrial alcohol is no more at fault when a crook sells it as a beverage than are axes to be blamed because somebody uses one to commit murder. Law is for persons, not for inanimate things.

Industrial alcohol is a necessity. It must be denatured with such unpotable substances as will not interfere with its employment in the arts. If the prohibition law has prostituted industrial alcohol, the fault lies with the law, and the fight should be waged against the law directly.

The same organ is also authority for the following statement. The wet bloc of 61, chiefly from the industrial centers where these industrial plants are located, should note especially the cluding sentence: "To prohibit its use [that of methanol] in such manner before a suitable substitute is offered would be tantamount, from an industrial standpoint, to repeal of the industrial alcohol law."

METHANOL APPROACHES THE IDEAL AS A DENATURANT FOR ALCOHOL

Methanol, which, as a denaturant for industrial alcohol, has especially been visited with the righteously assumed wrath of those who would involve the Government of the United States in "the greatest poisoning plot in the world's history," approaches the ideal as an agent for destroying the character of alcohol as a beverage. For this reason the act of June 7, 1906, which authorized tax freedom in the industrial use of alcohol, specifically mentions methyl alcohol (now called methanol more effectively to differentiate it from ethyl alcohol) alone as a denaturing agent.

This designation of methanol as an authorized denaturant is supportable from every point of view tenable in the reasonable consideration of the case of industrial alcohol. Physically, methanol is so closely similar to ethyl alcohol that it does not impair the usefulness of the latter as a solvent, a fuel, an antifreeze agent, or a preservative, when mixed therewith. A mixture of methanol and ethyl alcohol is so homogenous as to be inseparable without the most exacting and skillful manipulation in expensive, elaborate, and intricate apparatus. It is a constant-boiling mixture which can not be broken up into its constituents by ordinary fractionating distillation. Methanol is poisonous, of course, but in the proportion in which it is present in even the most heavily methylated completely denatured alcohol, its poisonous properties are not a bar to the legitimate use of the mixture under proper conditions. This mixture contains about 9 per cent of methanol. Canada requires 30 per cent of methanol in its standard completely denatured alcohol. Ten parts of methanol to 100 parts of ethyl alcohol is the customary requirement in European countries.

The hazard of foolhardy, promiscuous drinking was recognized in the authorization of formulas for completely denatured alcohol long before conditions arose to aggravate it. No simple mixture of methanol and ethyl alcohol is authorized for general use in this country. All must contain at least one other ingredient which will facilitate the recognition of the unpotable nature of the liquid. In addition, it is required that the methanol used for denaturing purposes must be an unrefined grade with readily perceptible physical characteristics which differentiate it from ethyl alcohol. Even when disguised with colors, odors, and flavors, the presence of methanol in an alcoholic mixture can be readily detected by a simple chemical test.

Methanol, in the proportions required in denaturing, unquestionably destroys the character of ethyl alcohol as a beverage. It is, therefore, satisfactory in that respect. An idea of its suitability from the industrial standpoint may be got from the fact that specially denatured alcohol, formula No. 1, which is a mixture of 5 parts of methanol and 100 parts of ethyl alcohol, has been authorized for use for more than 230 industrial purposes, and special denatured alcohol, formula No. 3A, which contains a similar proportion of a more refined methanol, has been authorized in about 50 processes. But few of the other sixty-odd specially denatured formulas, with the exception of those which contain methanol along with other agents, have been authorized for more than half a dozen purposes each; none for as many as 30.

Efforts have been made in several countries to find a better denaturant than methanol for wide application in the industrial use of alcohol. In so far as we are informed, none of these has been successful, and methanol remains the most favored denaturing agent in all countries. Neither industry nor the Government in this country has found any reason to replace methanol as a general denaturant, and no reason has been presented in the recent ado about the horror of exposing drinkers to the risk of poisoning. It is, therefore, not likely that the authorization to use methanol as a denaturant will be revoked. To prohibit its use in such manner, before a suitable substitute is offered, would be tantamount, from an industrial standpoint, to repeal of the industrial alcohol law.

And further:

ADEQUATE DENATURING OF ALCOHOL IS INDUSTRY'S NEED AND RIGHT

It would seem, in the light of recent developments, that industry and economists have had an erroneous conception of the purpose of the law enacted June 7, 1906, permitting the tax-free withdrawal of alcohol. These misguided folk have had faith in their ability to interpret the requirements of the law, that alcohol so withdrawn "shall have been mixed" with material which "destroys its character as a beverage and renders it unfit for liquid medicinal purposes." They have assumed that these words meant just what they say. But, if one may judge from the solemn pronouncements of substantial members of the public press and from the earnest utterances of Members of the Congress of the United States, this assumption has been all wrong, and the purpose of the statutory provisions for the denaturing of alcohol is the convenience of the bootlegger and of those who disbelieve in the Volstead Act in its application to their individual practices. The enactment of the latter statute was in reality, as these present-day commentarians see it, an amending of the act of 1906 to make available for beverage purposes alcoholic mixtures of a pleasant, innocuous nature, to replace the compounds previously known and used as whisky, brandy, and the like. One lives to learn in these days of a new and convenient logic.

There is a deal of ingenuity in the arguments now being presented against the use of noxious denaturants in industrial alcohol. The plausibility of suggestions for the use of harmless materials to comply with the act of 1906 and for the elimination of all denaturants, so as to permit industry to get pure alcohol free of tax, is quite convincing, as long as the suggestions are taken at their face value. But when one considers the purpose with which this gratuitous advice is offered and asks whether in all instances it comes from sources which would be wholly displeased to see industry in the United States again placed under the handicap of having to pay a heavy tax on a necessary raw material, doubt at least arises as to whether these suggestions do not in fact as well as potentially purpose the destruction of the industrial use of alcohol.

If there be no such purpose behind these suggestions, they must arise from stupidity of a degree inconceivable in the face of the facility with which accurate and adequate information with respect to the industrial alcohol act and its operation may be acquired. The additional supervision and inspection which would be necessary—and of doubtful efficacy—in connection with the use of potable alcohol in industry is not difficult to foresee. A materially greater inconvenience would arise than now arises in connection with the use of specially denatured alcohol from the insistence of a Government inspector that he be shown that the alcohol is actually going into the product which is in course of manufacture and is not being diverted through a hidden pipe line. It would be necessary to stop a process at demand, and the disastrousness of such action in certain processes (say, varnish making) where the maintenance of definite thermal conditions and the prevention of evaporation are absolute necessities can not be questioned.

It is only to stupidity or to political expediency that one can attribute the nature of the manifestation of interest on the part of certain Members of Congress in the agitation against the adequate denaturing of alcohol for industrial uses. Surely these Federal lawmakers should have been expected to know the provisions of the act of 1906. And yet in a joint resolution introduced into the House of Representatives it is gravely stated that "there is no law of Congress that requires poison to be introduced into denatured alcohol." The act of June 7, 1906, specifically requires that alcohol, to be exempted from the revenue tax, after withdrawal "shall have been mixed * * * with methyl alcohol (methanol) or other denaturing material * * * which destroys its character as a beverage and renders it unfit for liquid medicinal purposes. * * * It is conceivable that, in so far as the majority of tastes is concerned, an obnoxious denaturant would be sufficient to destroy the beverage character of alcohol. But such a denaturant, it is quite clear, would not wholly prevent the drinking of alcohol to which it had been added. And it is difficult to conceive of any denaturant obnoxious but not noxious which would meet the further requirement of the law (additional, not merely optional) that it render the alcohol "unfit for liquid medicinal purposes." The industrial alcohol law is clear in its requirements, and it has not been amended by the enactment of the Volstead Act.

* * * * * * *

And I commend to the Members from Baltimore and New York and other industrial centers:

There is no right in the destruction, or in the agitation of destruction, of property legitimately acquired and legitimately held. There is no equity in a movement toward that end which does not offer adequate reimbursement. The existing formulas for denaturing alcohol are the legitimate property of the many industries which have adapted their productive processes to the utilization of these formulas. These industries have, therefore, rights in this property that are as inviolable as are similar rights in whatsoever they may lie. Until there can be offered in replacement substitute formulas of equal satisfactoriness these rights are deserving of all the respect that attaches to any property.

And this other statement from the editorial from this same trade journal, headed, "Will Congress stop at the fork in the prohibition road?" I read:

Critical discussion in Congress of the fitness and efficacy of the Volstead law has come to a point where further progress in the line heretofore followed is impossible. A sign, "This is the law," has been met in the road, and beyond it the way lies in divergent paths. To follow one of these paths Congress must repudiate the pledge given to industry more than 20 years ago and repeated in Title III of the Volstead Act; for this path leads to the abolition of alcohol as an industrial raw material in order that the ends of prohibition may be served. To follow the other path Congress must abandon the purpose of the eighteenth amendment, for that path leads to the destruction of all the effectiveness of the denaturing of alcohol. Whither will Congress go?

Evidently Congress will not join the wet bloc in either of these alternatives that the Linthicum amendment would force upon us; we will neither paralyze industry by outlawing industrial alcohol nor will we abandon enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

A WORD FROM THE INDUSTRIES

Just a word from another representative of industry—and I have an idea that Capt. James P. McGovern would resent very much being called a fanatical prohibitionist. Captain McGovern, of Washington, is general counsel of the Industrial Alcohol Manufacturers' Association and Washington attorney for the National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association and other alcohol-using trade bodies. In an address by him he says, in part, to make a short extract.

In his preliminary he emphasizes that—there can be no development of chemical industry without alcohol any more than there could be a steel industry without pig iron, an electric industry without copper, or a fertilizer industry without potash and fixed nitrogen.

He points out that 3,000,0000 gallons annually are used in the protection of artificial silk and that alcohol may come to provide the answer to the motor-fuel problem.

He goes on to say:

Under existing law our Government has established many formulas of denatured alcohol to meet the everyday demands of the arts and industries, but there are only two allowed in the production of what is known as completely denatured alcohol—the kind that goes directly to the public. All other formulas are restricted to manufacturers who file bond, secure permits, keep records, and otherwise comply with stringent regulations.

It is of interest to note that Congress in framing the original denatured alcohol act—now over 20 years old—felt it necessary to impose a heavy penalty for the diversion of industrial alcohol to beverage purposes. This penalty is a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, and the forfeiture to the Government of all property used in connection with unlawful acts. Prohibition had nothing to do with these stern provisions, which are dictated by the necessities of control of industrially used alcohol, not only in this but in all civilized countries.

We have heard a lot about so-called "poison liquor" and those engaged in that sort of propaganda attempt to charge the Government with using poisons to enforce prohibition. Nothing could be further from the truth. As I have heretofore shown, alcohol is denatured under a law passed nearly 13 years before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment for the sole purpose of furnishing at the lowest possible price an essential raw material alcohol which had proven to be the backbone of the chemical supremacy then enjoyed by foreign competitors. It goes without saying that efficient denaturants are more necessary to-day than ever before. As a general rule, every formula of denatured alcohol can be considered as toxic if used for beverage purposes; but, by the same token, so is ethyl or grain alcohol. All completely denatured alcohol, however, is required by the Federal Government to bear the awe-inspiring "poison" label, so there is no excuse whatever for any innocent person being injured from its misuse. Why, therefore, should there be a hue and cry against the use of any denaturant which has been prescribed by the Government for lawful purposes? There are innumerable articles on the market that serve a useful end, but are detrimental to human life and health when carelessly or criminally handled. Many of us remember the excitement when the baby took hold of the kerosene can. More than one motorist has investigated the status of his gasoline tank with the aid of a lighted match and departed for regions where he no longer worried about the lack of an adequate fuel supply.

Instead of cough medicine the carbolic-acid bottle has been taken out of a dark medicine closet. No one thinks of blaming the inanimate commodity in those cases. Why, then, attack an efficient industrial alcohol product when it is wrongfully used? Any change in formulas of industrial alcohol for the benefit of the lawless drinker would be in direct violation of the spirit of the law under which the Bureau of Prohibition was created and operates. "Sop" to the opponents of prohibition might appeal to the political sagacity of weak-kneed executives, but in the case of the present Commissioner of Prohibition, himself a chemist, we need not have any fear in that regard. His professional standing and the ethics of the American Chemical Society, of which he is a member, constitute sufficient guaranty in that respect.

As a striking illustration of the difficulties under which reputable merchants are compelled to market their products under prohibition-enforcement conditions, let us take the case of the 40-year-old solidified fuel known as "sterno canned heat." We are all familiar with that commodity in its self-contained tins ready for burning in the home, camp, nursery, hospital, sick room, laboratory, and other places where an emergency fuel is required. It proved of inestimable value in the districts devastated by the Florida hurricane, your own Mississippi flood, and other disasters where an emergency fuel was sorely needed. It is manufactured under a formula approved pursuant to the provisions of the Volstead Act calling for five parts of wood alcohol and a percentage of pyridine, kerosene, and solidifying chemicals which make the finished commodity—in the opinion of Commissioner Doran, the most unfit substance for beverage purposes that could possibly be conceived; and yet we find intelligent people demanding that the sale of such an essential article of everyday life be stopped or subjected to prohibitive conditions because there are degenerates who unlawfully manipulate the product and extract therefrom a liquid which they take into their stomachs, with what results only hospital and morgue records can tell! Isn't that actually glorifying degeneracy, and does not the whole situation merely call for better enforcement of the adequate United States laws on the subject, which provide severe punishment for any person who sells or uses alcoholic preparations for illegal purposes? Surely law-abiding business men are entitled to your sympathetic support instead of being harrassed on all sides in their lawful pursuits. * * *

THE WET BLOC SHOULD HEED THE VOICE OF INDUSTRY

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take more of your time. I may add some under the permission to revise and extend my remarks. I did say to the Committee on the Judiciary a few years ago, when there was a bill pending before it for the constitution of a Prohibition Unit, that prohibition had no desire to impede a legitimate industry; that prohibition had enough enemies without making any unnecessarily. A new leadership has arisen here in the wet bloc, which came in the other day with flying banners minus the milk-white charger that was brought over from Baltimore to lead the wet parade in the House in the days of John Philip Hill, but still led by Baltimore. The wet bloc from New York and Brooklyn and Detroit and Cincinnati beat the tom-toms and sought to do away with industrial alcohol on the ground that some one sometimes disregards the poison label. The wet bloc by their proposal menaced great industries. I want to commend to them these expressions from the men speaking for those industries. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, the word "oil" has become a magic one. It seems to enter into political campaigns, political conferences, commercial advances, and almost every branch of life at this time. I am going to talk to you for a few minutes on the question of oil.

I represent in the Congress more men and women engaged in the production of oil and natural gas than any other Member. The oil industry is comparatively a new one. Many people look upon it as a kind of a closed corporation, participated in by a very few people. That is an erroneous idea. There are thousands of men and women in the United States engaged in this industry, Mr. Chairman, neither condoning or defending any wrongdoer. It is the men and women I am going to tell you of in the time just allotted me.

It is a sordid story of oil, politics, and public service that an investigating committee of another branch of the Congress has been bringing to light in the last few months, and especially the last few days.

If the final facts justify the conclusion, most people at this time have reached a few oilmen, a few public servants, and a few politicians have, in the Teapot Dome case, written the blackest page in the history of our Nation and deserve the condemnation of the people.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not of their guilt that I desire to speak. It is to be hoped and believed that finally, through the established channels of justice, their guilt or innocence will be established. It is entirely of another phase of the situation I desire to address myself.

Already throughout the Nation public sentiment is beginning to hold up to derision and criticism the great oil industry by reason of the participation in this sordid story of a very few men connected with that great industry. Already those not given to an analysis, but prone to hasty decisions are glad to use this case as further evidence that public officials are not to be trusted, and on thousands of tongues and in the minds of thousands of others has and is this regrettable episode being hailed as additional proof that all men who actively participate in American politics are crooked and only waiting to take advantage of opportunity, as seems to have been done by a few crooked politicians in this case.

But, Mr. Chairman, I point out that even in this case, which shakes the Nation, a very few public servants, a very few politicians, and a very few men of the oil industry participated, and that these few do not in any way represent the hopes, ambitions, the policy, the patriotism of the millions of men and women of this country who are public servants, who take part in political questions or are engaged in the great industry of producing oil. It is of this latter class, the oil and gas producers, that I want to speak.

It has been too true now, and has been too true in the past, that whenever the oil industry is mentioned that immediately the average and uninformed mind turns to thoughts of the few oilmen involved in the most deplorable Teapot Dome scandal or think of it, as it has been too often pictured in the past, as some cloven-footed monster ready, waiting, and anxious to take advantage and devour anything and all things that may cross its path.

Mr. Chairman, that is not the true story of the oil industry at all. The few men involved in this scandal represent only that part of the oil industry represented by their numbers, which at the most is only about a dozen of the thousands engaged in the great industry, and that part that has in the past been pictured as the destroying monster in no way represents the true sentiment, policies, actions, and accomplishments of the industry as a whole. Besides them there are thousands of the best citizens of this country interested and a part of this industry—and I make the assertion that no industry in the world can boast of a larger percentage of honest, industrious, patriotic members than can the oil industry of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have lived and worked among and with these people for over 20 years. I know them, and when I speak of them I speak with knowledge and authority.

I hold here in my hand a telephone directory of the city of Tulsa, Okla. Hundreds of companies and individuals who produce oil have their headquarters there. Tulsa is my home city. It is the oil capital of the world. From Tulsa is directed the production of oil in every oil field of the United States and in practically every foreign country where oil is produced. This directory contains the name and address of hundreds of oil companies and individual oil producers that are of the honest, industrious, and patriotic type that I have just spoken of.

Mr. Chairman, I wish I had time to tell you the story of each of these individuals. I know most of them personally. All of them have made good in the industry. They have taken a chance with their brains and their money—the oil business is a hazardous one—and through honest dealing, upright, and patriotic policies they have been successful; and, Mr. Chairman, when success has come to them they have not ceased to be honest, patriotic, charitable, and Christian citizens; but it has been the history of practically everyone of them that when success and riches have come they have taken their success and money with them into additional fields of activity. They have become city builders; they have become the leaders in civic enterprises; they have become the greatest donators to charity; they have become the pillars of the church, both spiritually and financially; they have become the builders of hospitals. On the subscription lists for building of both churches and hospitals their names are always found written in bold letters and followed by substantial contributions. They have become the sponsors of music, of art, of education, and morality. Especially is this true of education, for I have observed that they are leaders in educational matters; they educate their children; and in addition to this an examination of the rosters of the universities and colleges of this country will reveal that hundreds of other deserving boys and girls are being educated at the expense of liberal and patriotic oilmen. In fact, if I had time I could, without doubt, relate to you of each of them some act of charity, of civic enterprise, of religious interest, and of educational and moral nature that is outstanding and commendable.

With their own private funds—and in many cases individually—they have created endowments of universities and colleges for loaning to poor and deserving students; built monuments commemorating events and persons; given large amounts to the endowment of universities; built, maintained, and endowed a home to care for orphans; built costly and magnificent churches out of their own resources; provided parks and improved them with wading pools and playgrounds for the children; established game preserves for the protection of wild life; built and furnished homes for American Legions; subscribed liberally for maintenance of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.; established and maintained camps for boy scouts.

Mr. Chairman, these are but a few of the incidents and illustrations which I call to mind, and are typical of the spirit of the oil fraternity as a whole.

However, not all, by any means, of the activities of these people are confined to the men of this industry, but in each and every instance where the interests of religion, charity, education, music, art, and other uplifting activities are carried on will be found the mothers, wives, and daughters of these men just as liberal and active as they have been.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I desire to say that I am in accord with the gentleman in respect to his observations upon the patriotism and the public spirit of many prominent oilmen throughout this country. It would be ridiculous to obliterate an industry because of the frailties of a few men who happen to be engaged in that business, but in view of the fact that the newspapers carried a statement recently to the effect that Colonel Stewart had received a great number of telegrams congratulating him upon his attitude with respect to another body in refusing to answer questions propounded to him, I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that inasmuch as those telegrams were apparently indorsements of his course that it would be diplomatic for Colonel Stewart to give to the public the names of the senders of those telegrams?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Well, I will suggest to the gentleman that William Edward Hickman, out in Los Angeles, received a great many telegrams from people, but there is no evidence that any telegram received by Colonel Stewart was sent to him by the people of whom I am speaking.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I did not mean to intimate that they sent them, but I mean the inference is to be carried from that newspaper statement that Colonel Stewart did receive a great many telegrams which were considered by him in the nature of congratulations, and knowing the interest of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] in the proper advancement of every industry, I felt he might think it would be becomingly frank and sagacious for Colonel Stewart to publish these telegrams so the public might know who are in accord with him in regard to his attitude with respect to the inquiries propounded by the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. No doubt the colonel will take cognizance of the gentleman's request, and, perhaps, he will give that information. I do not know.

But, Mr. Chairman, not only should the men of an industry like this be judged by their activities in the lines I have discussed, but another yardstick that should be applied is their treatment of those who labor for them.

A few days ago we listened to the story of conditions in the coal fields of western Pennsylvania. We shuddered as we were told of the treatment accorded the miners and their families by the operators in these coal fields, and our blood boiled with indignation as we had recited to us stories of the ejectment of innocent women and children from their homes in the dead of winter.

No such scenes as these were ever enacted in the oil fields of America. Contrary to this the oilman has always looked after the welfare of his employee and family. He has realized that labor is worthy of its hire and he has practiced that policy.

He pays good wages, takes the employee into his confidence, and profits thereby. Never in the history of the oil industry, so far as I know or can learn, has there been a serious or protracted dispute between employer and employee, and I am sure that there is no more loyal employee in any industry than those of the oil industry from the roustabout, the pumper, the driller, the tool dresser, to and including the farm boss and superintendent, clerk, and stenographer.

In the story of the coal fields we were told of the stockades, shacks used for residences, the company stores that impose upon the employees, and the generally bad, even to insanitary, conditions surrounding these wage earners.

No such system as this has ever been practiced by the oilmen. Instead of stockades in every large oil field will be found community houses maintained by employer for the benefit of the employees. Instead of shacks for the homes of the employees you will find on practically every lease and in every camp modern homes built by the employer, and around these well-built and painted homes you will find flower beds, garden spots, and all other things that go to make up the conveniences of a well-regulated home. Instead of the company store you will find that the employee is treated as a free American citizen, paid his wages promptly on pay day, and allowed to spend it where and for whatever he sees fit. Instead of the insanitary conditions that seem to exist in the coal fields you will find in each and every one of these camps that steps are taken immediately by the oilmen to protect in every way the health and comfort of his employee. In every camp of any material size you will find the company physician, there without expense to the employee, to minister to his wants; you will find the trained nurse on the pay roll of the company and, in most instances, a company drug store ready to furnish such medicines and materials as are needed to relieve and prevent the suffering of the employee.

Financial honesty is the outstanding plank of the code of ethics of the real and true oilman. He is known to consider a financial obligation as sacred and binding, whether given by word of mouth or recorded in an instrument of writing.

His reputation and record in dealing with his city, his county, his State, and Government is one that will bear the closest scrutiny. Hundreds of them yearly have business dealings with the Department of the Interior of the Government, and their dealings with the State in which they are located are voluminous, and I am sure that a search of the records of any of these departments would disclose that in these dealings he has always been fair, honest, and patriotic. Illustrating, may I not call attention to the fact that for four years I was State auditor of the State of Oklahoma. Under the laws of that State the State auditor collects on behalf of the people the tax on oil and gas produced within the State. During my four years as State auditor I collected from these people in round numbers $16,000,000. In making these collections I accepted in payment thereof the personal checks of the companies or individuals, whether executed in the accounting room or written on the floor of the derrick with a lead pencil. Remarkable as it may seem, in all this great transaction never was there one of these checks returned to me as unpaid by the bank on which it was drawn.

Permit me in closing to say that there are no more patriotic body of men and women than those connected with this industry. Illustrating, I call attention to the fact that during the Great War these men, their sons, their employees, were found in every patriotic activity from actual and effective service in the front-line trenches to the rendering of each and every duty exacted of them as citizens by their Government. They bought Liberty bonds and Government securities by the millions of dollars worth, and in all of these activities where the women participated could be found the wives, mothers, and daughters of the men of this fraternity. Not only this, but when the clouds of the war were darkest, when one of the greatest essentials of success was found to be petroleum and its products, the oil producer did not hesitate but said to his Government, "Fix the price of oil, tell us where you want it delivered, and we will furnish it." This they did, spending millions of their own money in exploiting new territory and bringing to the surface all the oil needed in that great conflict, much of this oil having been produced, refined, and crossed the ocean before the producer and refiner knew what he was to receive for it. So decisive and beneficial was this patriotic action that it has been said that in that great conflict we floated to victory on a sea of oil.

Mr. Chairman, this is but a brief résumé of some of the things which I personally know of the oil industry and the great body of citizens who go to make it up, and representing more of them in the United States Congress than any other Member, it is with the greatest degree of pride that I speak of them to-day.

In conclusion let me suggest to you that in the future when some individual in the oil industry goes wrong, you remember that he is the exception and that in no circle is he more generally condemned than by the members of the oil fraternity. And remember also, that in no industry in America is the percentage of honor, integrity, character, and patriotism higher or more jealously guarded than in the oil industry. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article entitled "Government poisoned alcohol," by Hugh B. Rossell.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

GOVERNMENT-POISONED ALCOHOL

By Hugh B. Rossell

Among the many evil consequences of prohibition, there is one in which there is no question of intoxication nor even of drinking.

Alcohol is absolutely indispensable to many useful arts and is a very useful drug in every home and workshop. We use it as the fuel for chafing dishes, spirit lamps, blowpipes, etc.; as the solvent for gums and dyes in making varnish, wood filler, or stain; as a general cleansing agent; and to prevent the freezing of water-cooled motors. It is ideal for all these purposes. It has the further advantage of being nonpoisonous. No harm would result from the accidental swallowing of a small quantity, nor are the products of its combustion nor the fumes of its evaporation in any way poisonous. In all of these uses there is no question of "drinking the stuff."

The framers of the Wheeler-Volstead law evidently appreciated these facts and made, according to their notions, provision for the people to obtain alcohol for technical purposes, but their plan, to say the least, does not work out well in practice. You can buy alcohol at any paint store or large drug store, but you do not get pure, clean alcohol. You get the Government-poisoned kind; that is, alcohol that has been heavily charged with a fearful poison, and also befouled with heavy hydrocarbons, or, in plain language, dirt. And the poison and the dirt have been added by order of the prohibition laws and regulations.

Now consider the properties of this "Government-poisoned alcohol." If swallowed, a deadly poison, identical with the venom of ants, hornets, and other insects, will be formed in the digestive organs, and death is almost certain to result. If burned, the same poison may be generated as a product of combustion. The fumes of evaporation are deadly, causing blindness, coma, and death. Many fatalities have resulted from inhaling the vapor, prohibition propagandists to the contrary notwithstanding. By contact with the skin the poisoned alcohol will cause neuritis. The person whose business requires him to handle this horrible mixture, if he values his life, should protect himself with rubber gloves and a gas mask.

Nor is this all. The "Government-poisoned alcohol" is so dirty as to be wholly unfit for many technical purposes. It will not dissolve sandarach (a fine varnish gum used like shellac, but far superior to it) with any degree of satisfaction. Its flame is more or less smutty. If used as a cleanser, it will leave a film of dirt upon the object cleaned.

There are other varieties of "Government-poisoned alcohol" besides the paint-store kind. There is the so-called medicated alcohol, which is alcohol adulterated with a powerful, evil-smelling, poisonous drug. It is almost worthless for technical purposes. Bay rum, hair tonic, "body rub," and other lotions are poisoned with "tartar emetic" or other dangerous drugs. The result is that these lotions sometimes cause illness when used and are so corrosive as to be destructive to the atomizers in which they are used. All kinds of perfumes are adulterated with "brucine," a poisonous vegetable alkaloid, almost identical with strychnine.

To sum up: The manufacturers of alcohol and alcoholic fluids are compelled by law to adulterate their products with poisons and unclean substances before they can sell them in open market. This compulsory adulteration has cost many human lives. Is there no relief?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MOREHEAD].

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present a petition from some of my constituents in Nebraska. The petition is more than 50 feet long and has some 2,000 names attached to it. I only mention this, Mr. Chairman, to show that the people are in earnest about the proposition of mixing the church and the State. This is not the only petition I have received protesting against House bill 78, or any other measure which is intended to abridge the religious ideas of the people.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOREHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman have reference to the Lankford bill?

Mr. MOREHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Which applies to the District of Columbia?

Mr. MOREHEAD. To the District of Columbia; yes.

Mr. SNELL. I have received several petitions in regard to that bill, and it appears that a lot of people in my State are terribly disturbed about it.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Those who have signed this petition represent all the professions in which people engage in an agricultural section, and the heading of the petition is brief, so I would like to have the privilege of printing it in the RECORD. I do not ask to have the names printed, but just the heading, so that the people who have signed the petition may know I have given attention to their protest.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Petition against compulsory Sunday observance

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives, greetings:

Believing—

(1) In the American principle of a complete separation of church and state;

(2) That Congress is prohibited by the first amendment to the Constitution from enacting any law "enforcing the proper observance" of any religious institution, or looking toward a union of church and state, or of religion in civil government;

(3) That the observance of a religious institution is a form of worship, and that all "labor, worldly business, and legitimate recreation" can only be forbidden for religious reasons;

(4) That all such legislation is opposed to the best interests of both the church and the state;

(5) That any such legislation either by Congress or the State legislatures is dangerous, and should be opposed by every lover of liberty of conscience and the voluntary exercise of religion:

Therefore we, the undersigned adult residents of Lancaster County, of the State of Nebraska, earnestly petition your honorable body not to pass H. R. 78, or any compulsory Sunday bills that have been introduced.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my purpose in obtaining this leave is to ask the privilege of extending my remarks on farm-relief legislation and to include a copy of a resolution which I introduced to investigate the Department of Agriculture and the activities of the New York Cotton Exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution referred to follows:

Whereas the Department of Agriculture, on or about September 1, 1927, made public a report on boll-weevil conditions throughout the Cotton Belt which contained statements that were inaccurate; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture, on or about September 15, 1927, made public a report purporting to give a reliable estimate of the world carry-over of cotton as of July 31, 1927, which contained statements that were inaccurate and based upon information received from nonofficial sources; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture, on or about September 15, 1927, made public a report relating to the probable farm price situation during the balance of the year which contained predictions that the future trend of cotton prices would be lower; and

Whereas these reports were unauthorized and resulted in a decline of cotton prices with a loss to the farmers of the country of many millions of dollars; and

Whereas it is reported that the New Orleans, New York, and Chicago Cotton Exchanges were concerned with the issuance or publication of such reports: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the accuracy of such reports, to ascertain the sources of information upon which such reports were based, to investigate the activities of the New Orleans, New York, and Chicago Cotton Exchanges in connection with the issuance or publication of such reports, to investigate such other matters relating to the cotton situation since January 1, 1926, as the committee or subcommittee deems advisable, and to report thereon to the House as soon as practicable. For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittees, which shall not be in excess of $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, in Habana, former Secretary of State Hughes, the head of our delegation at the Pan American Union Conference, made a speech which, I think, marks a milestone along the path of permanent peace, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting that speech in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

MR. HUGHES'S ADDRESS

HABANA, February 16.—Associated Press.—The United States was placed heartily behind the proposal to outlaw all aggressive warfare in this hemisphere and in favor of full arbitration by the speech of Charles Evans Hughes, head of the American delegation, before the session to-day of the Pan American Conference committee on public international law. Mr. Hughes's speech, in part, follows:

"It is my happy privilege to say for the United States of America that we would join most heartily in a declaration that there shall be no war of aggression in America. I am in entire accord with the proposal that we should show that this hemisphere is dedicated to the interests of peace, and that we should endeavor to find pacific solutions for all the controversies that may arise. Without suggesting any superiority for ourselves, we have very happy traditions in this hemisphere.

"Most of the controversies that have vexed us have already been settled. Very few remain. They can be adjusted peacefully. If we have this high aim of securing pacific adjustment of our difficulties, we shall not fail to attain it. I am happy to join in that effort to which, not simply speaking from the position as chairman of the American delegation—important as that is—but speaking out of my own heart I would wish to give all the strength and energy that I possess.

THREE WAYS FOR SETTLEMENT

"How shall we promote peaceful settlement? I think there are three ways:

"First. By conferences; by those important periodical meetings at which we can promote a better acquaintance and have a candid intercourse of views.

"Second. By means of conciliation—that is to say, the provision of some practical means by which when difficult situations arise reason may have its play before force takes the field.

"Third. In the judicial settlement of controversies. Reason and justice must have their institutions. They can not exist merely as abstract concepts to which we pay our verbal devotion. We must have institutions of peace. The great problem is how to establish them; how to secure agreement upon them. It is desired that we shall go as far as we can, and that then we shall endeavor, step by step, to make a progressive approach to our ideals.

"The important question before us is with respect to the project which Doctor Alfaro, of Panama, has presented. It has been subjected to an analysis in a very clear, illuminating, and forceful manner by Doctor Kira, president of the Chilean delegation. That analysis makes it unnecessary for me to dwell at length upon some of the questions involved.

INTERNATIONAL CONTROVERSIES

"Then there is a class of cases of controversies which should not be strictly regarded as international controversies at all. One State objects to the internal legislation of another State in a matter entirely within the province of that State. The objecting State should recognize that is a matter of internal government. But internal government projects in these days of intimate relations, in the actual force of its decisions into areas where other governments seek to find a freer play. So about internal questions some controversies may arise.

"All have questions in each of our countries which we think are within our competency because they relate to internal administration. I could name some, and I could go around this room and enumerate questions of that sort which I am sure many of you would never submit to arbitration.

"Now we must face the facts in this matter fairly. My conception of amity among the nations is a sort of friendship which will enable us to deal with these difficult questions in our negotiations with each other without the effort to compel nations to relinquish rights or to change their internal organization, or to submit to the decrees of others in matters which affect internal regulations according to their conceptions of their interests. So our problem is, What progress can we make?

TREATY AND LAW CONFERENCES

"There is one class of controversies about which we can make a convention without great difficulty. Those are controversies relating to questions involving the interpretation of treaties or the principles of international law where the claims are for loss of life or personal injuries, or injuries to property and where the reparation sought is entirely pecuniary. We could have a claims convention without going into some of the difficulties which would arise in dealing with a broader convention. I do not mean to exclude the broader convention. I am simply thinking of making practical progress by having something on which we can start with a maximum of agreement. We can have two classes of convention, a convention relating to pecuniary claims and another convention relating to broader matters.

"I do not wish to detain the committee with a long statement, but I can not forbear to say that I think the project presented fails to exhaust the possibilities. While states might not be willing to submit to arbitration various delicate questions which they thought impending on the free exercise of their internal authority, still it might be possible to have joint commissions whose reports advising the different governments and legislatures would be of great value.

"In 1909 the United States made its treaty with Great Britain with respect to Canada, and established a joint commission in which each Government has an equal number of members and to which all sorts of question arising on our boundary can be referred for examination, the taking of testimony, and report to the respective Governments.

PERMANENT JOINT COMMISSION

"A nation may be willing, entirely willing, to have a permanent joint commission with its neighbor or neighbors, so that in any question that arises there may be an explanation of the questions not for the purpose of decision but so that each government may be advised of the views and findings of a commission on which they have an equal representation, and then its legislature, supreme in its sphere, can act with that knowledge. This plan has worked very well, and questions which might not perhaps have been submitted to arbitration—some of difficulty, some of delicacy—have been considered by the permanent joint commission and reports have been made which led to satisfactory adjustments.

"Let us be astute to find means suited to the different exigencies which we can not escape.

"A final word: The test of arbitration and the weakness of plans for arbitration lie in the selection of the third or fifth arbitrator, as the case may be, who actually decides the controversy. Arbitrators are selected for the respective nations, and in some historic cases the arbitrator selected by one power has not supported that power, but those cases are extremely rare. We know in advance the pivotal man, the third man, is the man who will decide. I have been in negotiations for arbitration where the names of the most distinguished jurors in the world have been submitted and eliminated.

PROJECT OF ARBITRATION

"Reference was made to the apprehension of States in regard to arbitration. They center about this selection. Now this project, when it comes to the final test where the parties do not agree, leaves the selection to chance. That is to say, if there is no agreement, two chiefs of state are to be designated, one by each party, who maintain friendly relations with both parties, but in the language of treaties and diplomacy, friendship is not the same as it is in the language of social intercourse. There are chiefs of state at times which we would not desire to select, although he would be far from suggesting that our relations in a diplomatic sense were not entirely friendly.

"These two chiefs of state, one selected by each party, are designated, and one of these is to be selected by lot, for example, the flip of a coin.

"There are two objections: The first is that it is by chance, and the whole arbitration rests upon that. The broader you make the arbitration the more important is this point. The second objection to such a method of choice is that it is essentially political. I think we should endeavor to get away from a final selection in case we could not agree upon a third arbitrator which would be in any manner influenced by political considerations. It might be impossible entirely to eliminate that feature, but we should strive in that direction in order to have an impartial, juridical settlement.

THREE CHIEFS OF STATE

"My suggestion would be that instead of providing for two chiefs of state, one to be selected by lot, that we should select three outstanding non-American jurists, who should select with a sense of responsibility of their reputation and juridical standing the third arbitrator, who in that case might more closely approach to our ideal of an impartial judge. Such jurists would be more likely to give us the selection of some one on whom we could rely as not influenced by political considerations.

"I do not wish to detain you with observations. I wish to join with you in this effort to the full extent of my ability. If we can not complete it now, let us prepare for a future day, when we can accomplish our purpose with full consideration of all the questions which necessarily arise. I desire to show to you the sincere cooperation of the United States, which is opposed to any act of aggression, which desires to see force eliminated from this hemisphere; which is seeking nothing but the good order, the importance, and the prosperity of all the American States."

The speech was received by delegates as an utterance of historical importance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARILLON FOR CHURCH OF GOOD COUNSEL

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent on behalf of my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of carillons, and also on the subject of punishment of crime.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill to remit the duty paid by the Church of Good Counsel, Borough of Brooklyn, State of New York, on the importation of a carillon of bells which it is now using in church services. A number of similar bills have been passed by previous Congresses for Catholic churches and other denominations, and these bring up the necessity for amending the tariff law to exempt the 40 per cent duty now imposed upon the importation of bells in carillon.

The law is just only in so far as it is applicable to such bells as would involve competition with bells of American founders, but is unjust where it applies to such bells as are imported for use as a carillon, particularly in church services.

Our American bell founders can not supply bells for carillon purposes and consequently no protection of an industry is involved. The highest form of bell music, and in fact, the only form that can be defined as an art is that of carillon. There are five well-defined kinds of bells:

1. Individual bells, such as locomotive, fire, church, clock-striking bells. They usually give a signal of some sort. Little attention is paid to their musical quality.

2. Small peals: This is the collective use of bells when three or four are grouped together for sounding "bugle calls" or the gongs of "Big Ben" on the British House of Commons.

3. Ringing peals: This is the higher class of collective bells. They are found in sets of 8, 10, or 12 bells. Here the bells are swung, and they are thus called ringing peals. Their control is by means of ropes.

4. Chimes: This is a still higher class of music derived from the collective use of bells. A chime also contains 8, 10, or 12 bells, but the bells are stationary and not swung. They are sounded by means of clappers, which are connected with a console or keyboard. The notes of a chime are usually that of a major scale.

5. Carillons: The carillon differs from a chime in that it is more extensive in range of notes. It contains all the semitones of the chromatic scale. It requires bells of the finest musical quality and tone. It usually has three octaves or about 35 bells. Its maximum compass of range is 53 bells or four and one-half octaves. The action and console of a carillon is similar to the keyboard of a piano or organ. There are usually two rows for the hands and two rows for the feet. The player, who sits on a bench and plays like an organist, is called a carillonneur.

In carillon music there is a great variety of melodies, with harmonies and chords like on an organ or piano.

Frederick C. Mayer, organist and choirmaster of the United States Military Academy, says:

The art of casting and tuning bells of the highest musical quality was known and extensively practiced in Flanders several hundred years ago. But this art (of carillon), like that of the old Italian makers of master violins, soon became lost; in the case of bells the art has been rediscovered only within the present generation. This rediscovery has occurred in England, and to-day it is from this country alone that such high-quality bells, suitable for carillons, can be obtained. Thus it is that an entirely new problem is created and a revival in the old carillon art is in full swing in England, Holland, and Belgium.

Any boy can learn to play a chime, providing he has a simple knowledge of music, within a month. But in Belgium there is a national school of carillon playing maintained by the Belgian Government, where the art of a carillonneur is taught with as great artistic thoroughness, pursued through years of serious devotion, as that connected with other branches of the art of music. The comparison of the 12-note console of what is often spoken of as our best native chime, that in the tower of the Cadet Chapel, West Point, N. Y., with the 45-note console of the finest carillon now in the world, that in the tower of the cathedral of Malines, Belgium, would be like comparing a child's toy piano keyboard of one octave of white keys only with a standard piano keyboard of full and complete compass. And the difference in the music possible from these two sets of bells is like comparing the playing of a child with that of a mature artist.

Walter Damrosch has expressed himself similarly.

Our native bell founders can not manufacture carillon. They have never tried. They probably do not know the secret underlying the beautiful tonal quality and timbre of huge bells. It has been said:

A good bell is not made by chance but is the result of a wise combination of qualities and though, a fine carillon is as precious as a violin by Stradivarius.

Most of the carillons imported in this country have been used in churches for religious purposes. Statuary, altars, hyssops, baptismal founts, shrines, relics, and so forth, used in religious services are permitted to come into this country free of duty. Why not carillons?

From a religious, cultural, and artistic standpoint any carillon set up in a church tower has a tremendous potency in any community. I would like to see encouraged in this country the art of carillon music, so that in every city, town, or hamlet they would have carillons with their bells hung in an open tower—the carillon to be the property of the community, just as a museum or the city hall are of public concern.

The sweet and tender music of the carillon would be heard miles around. In Europe, this summer, I had the exquisite pleasure of hearing carillon music. The programs included the simplest folk songs as well as compositions by Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and Chopin. The music afforded splendid recreation for many thousands.

It is obvious, therefore, that the present tariff on bells in carillon is unjust in that it hinders a development of an art and places handicaps upon the creation of religious music.

LET THE PUNISHMENT FIT THE CRIME

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives will soon vote on one or two bills now before it. One bill seeks to make compulsory a jail sentence for prohibition violations, and the other would make of such violation a felony, carrying punishment of five years' imprisonment. There are many "drys" who believe that such penalties are not half severe enough, and that they should be made more barbarous—more in keeping with the "dry" credo.

In order, therefore, that they might procure the most cruel, the most refined, and most hideous forms of punishment I propose a "ferocity contest." Only "drys" shall be eligible, particularly the fanatical ones. I offer a $100 prize to the person who shall submit the most savage and ferocious type of pain or penalty.

The following forms shall be deemed too mild and temperate for any consideration whatsoever, to wit:

Breaking at the wheel; impalement; thumbscrew, as used in the Spanish Inquisition; the "water cure" of the Philippines; the pillory; the ducking stool; banishment to Devils Island; the iron coffin; scalping; burning at the stake; burning in oil.

In England, formerly, as punishment for the crime of treason, the accused was hanged; his body was cut down while alive, then he was disemboweled, his head cut off, and his body quartered. That is what I would call a prize winner.

Another good sample would be to cut the limbs off if too long, and to stretch them if too short, to fit the Procrustean prohibition bed.

Somebody has suggested that the victims become galley slaves for the Shipping Board.

However, in order that the contestants be placed in the proper frame of mind, I suggest that in all "dry" communities a few prohibition violators be blindfolded, hands tied behind them, set up against a wall, and then all the "drys" shall be permitted to hurl knives and hatchets at them.

Address all communications to the judges of the "ferocity contest."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WURZBACH, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Connecticut whether he expects to have any more Private Calendar days now that a general claims bill has been passed? What is going to be the policy from now until the end of the session with reference to the consideration of claim bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. TILSON. The bill referred to has not been passed by the Senate and probably will not become a law for some time. I assume that we should go forward with our Private Calendar just the same as if the bill had not been passed by the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It has occurred to me that if the gentleman wants the Private Calendar considered, it would not interfere usually with the membership to work on Saturday if it is generally understood there would only be considered bills on the calendar unobjected to. There is getting to be quite a long list of bills on the calendar as the gentleman no doubt has noticed.

Mr. TILSON. I have found that there are more Members interested in private bills than in any other kind, and, as many Members wish to leave the city on Saturdays, it is an inconvenience to them to stay over to watch their bills if the calendar is to be called.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman does expect to have a Private Calendar day at an early time?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I think there will be plenty of time after the appropriation bills are passed to consider all the bills on the Private Calendar just as we did in the last Congress. I hope to be able to do this again before adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order previously made, adjourned to meet on Monday, February 20, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I present and ask to have inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce a memorial of the National Chamber of Commerce in relation to flood control, and a communication from the American Federation of Labor on the same subject.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred, with the accompanying letter, to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1928.

Hon. HARRY B. HAWES,
Member Committee on Commerce,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The membership of the American Federation of Labor is deeply interested in legislation providing for the control of flood waters in the Mississippi Valley. We firmly believe this is a problem that ought to be met and solved at this session of Congress. For this reason I am communicating with you in the name of and in behalf of the membership of the American Federation of Labor asking you to support legislation designed for the purpose of preventing a recurrence of the awful flood which caused so much devastation, destruction, and human suffering last spring.

The officers and members of the American Federation of Labor believe that the cost of flood control in the Mississippi Valley should be borne by the Federal Government. The task is so great and the problem so complicated and difficult that it seems that the Federal Government is the proper agency to undertake and complete this great enterprise. Besides all the people will be benefited, either directly of indirectly, by the conservation of property, health, and life in the vast section of our country included within the flood district. The character of the work, its permanency, and the fact that the situation requires that the flood-control work must be performed in a number of States lend force and effect to the argument that the work should be undertaken and completed by the Federal Government.

It may be that there is some merit in the proposal that the different States directly benefited should contribute equitably and proportionately toward the maintenance and upkeep of the flood-control devices after the original work has been completed.

Yours respectfully,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

(Special bulletin January 6, 1928, Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, Washington, D. C. Referendum No. 51, Mississippi flood control, 1927)

The chamber's committee on Mississippi flood control presented a report to the board of directors. The propositions set forth in this report were submitted to referendum vote on October 31, 1927, and the balloting closed on December 15, 1927. The present bulletin sets out the details of the votes which were cast in the referendum.

In the balloting each organization cast as many votes as it may have delegates at an annual meeting of the chamber. The number of delegates an organization may have depends upon the number of its members, but in no case falls below 1 or exceeds 10.

The propositions submitted, and the results of the balloting on each proposition, were as follows:

I. The committee recommends that the Federal Government should hereafter pay the entire cost of constructing and maintaining works necessary to control floods of the lower Mississippi River.

Votes in favor 2,131
Votes opposed 512

In addition to the votes counted in the above totals there were 15 votes actually cast in favor, but with the qualifications appearing in each case in the notes at the end of this pamphlet, and 170 votes cast in opposition with qualifications and explanations as shown in each instance at the end of this pamphlet.

II. The committee recommends that the Federal Government should assume the sole responsibility for locating, constructing, and maintaining such works.

Votes in favor 2,581
Votes opposed 240

In addition to the votes counted in the above totals there were 14 votes actually cast in favor, but with the qualifications appearing in each case in the notes at the end of this pamphlet, and 34 votes cast in opposition with qualifications and explanations as shown in each instance at the end of this pamphlet.

Under the by-laws the chamber is committed on a proposition submitted to referendum by a two-thirds vote representing at least 20 States, provided at least one-third of the voting strength of the chamber has been polled.

The detailed vote is tabulated on the pages which follow. Notes are added to indicate such definite action as members took in connection with the votes which they cast.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 319) thereon.

I desire to give notice that I expect to call the bill up for consideration at a very early hour, possibly this afternoon or to-morrow, but as early as I am able to do so.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HOWELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1691) for the relief of William A. Light, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 320) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2820) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate certain field guns to the city of Dallas, Tex., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 321) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) to provide for an agricultural day, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 322) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 1186) to provide for the construction of the Deschutes project in Oregon, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 323) thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5380) to correct the military record of G. W. Gilkison; and

A bill (H. R. 9151) for the relief of Joseph M. Black.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 3198) to amend the act of March 3, 1915, granting double pension for disability from aviation duty, Navy or Marine Corps, by inserting the word "Army," so as to read: "Army, Navy, and Marine Corps," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 324) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 204) to authorize an additional appropriation for Fort McHenry, Md., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 325) thereon.

Mr. BLACK (for Mr. TRAMMELL), from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3201) for the relief of Paul D. Carlisle, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 326) thereon.

Mr. BLACK, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2061) for the relief of W. H. Kaufman (Rept. No. 327); and

A bill (S. 2926) for the relief of the Old Dominion Land Co. (Rept. No. 328).

Mr. BLACK also, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2657) for the relief of George W. Boyer, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 329) thereon.

THE SHINGLE INDUSTRY—AMENDMENT TO TAX REDUCTION BILL

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, one of the leading industries in our State is the shingle industry. When the tariff act of 1922 was passed it put shingles on the free list. That industry is now threatened with bankruptcy. I desire to offer an amendment and ask that it be printed, intended to be proposed by me to the tax bill, House bill 1, the tax reduction bill, when it shall come before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. SACKETT and Mr. TYSON each submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes, which were separately ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate not to exceed $1,500,000 for the reimbursement of funds contributed by local interests to the Mississippi River Commission, and used for emergency levee construction and repair work on the lower Mississippi River on account of the flood of 1927, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF DALLAS FEDERAL RESERVE BANK

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. HOWELL. I desire to be courteous, but time is limited until 2 o'clock, and debate thereafter is to be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I will give the Senator from Nebraska my five minutes. I desire to present a resolution.

Mr. HOWELL. If the Senator desires me to yield merely for the presentation of a resolution, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. MAYFIELD. A few days ago I received a communication from Hon. Homer D. Wade, secretary of the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, in which he complains about the management of the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district, which is located at Dallas, Tex. I send the communication to the Secretary's desk, with the request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST TEXAS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Stamford, Tex., February 10, 1928.

DEAR FRIEND: The West Texas Chamber of Commerce, representing 305 cities and towns in the western half of Texas, with an affiliated membership of 9,150 business and professional men, has for its primary object the constructive development of an area larger than the New England States by 10,000 square miles, also larger in area than the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois by 10,000 square miles. This section has a population of more than 2,000,000 persons, as patriotic and progressive as any people on earth.

This great region is essentially a stock-raising and agricultural country. In the entire Union the census reports disclose that between 1920 and 1925 there was a decrease of 75,735 farms. But in this western half of Texas there was an increase of 21,099 farms, the largest increase of any one State in the Union and two-thirds of the new farms of Texas were in this section.

These figures are given to show the importance of agriculture in west Texas and as a prelude to the matters to which your attention is directed.

The West Texas Chamber of Commerce is the heart and voice of these 2,000,000 people in west Texas. Its policies are fixed by an executive board, consisting of the leading business and professional men from all sections of west Texas, who hold quarterly meetings. Its activities are directed by a general manager, who has the constant advice of the president. This great organization regards agriculture as the basis of wealth. It, however, concerns itself in every phase of human endeavor that is for the upbuilding of the section it serves in particular, and the entire country in general.

Consistent with these ambitions the executive board at a meeting held in Cisco, Tex., June 13, 1927, at which 65 members were present, passed the following resolution:

"Whereas the Federal Reserve Board was organized for the purpose of real financial assistance to banking interests in times of financial stress; and

"Whereas the Federal reserve act has proved and is proving of great benefit to the member banks of each section, but the rules invoked in some cases have worked hardships on account of the fact that they are interpreted as in accordance with strict banking rules and seem inflexible: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this West Texas Chamber of Commerce urges the Federal Reserve Board of the eleventh district to adopt a more sympathetic attitude and secure a better understanding of the needs of member banks located in sections of the country where the local conditions are unfavorable from climatic or other conditions, thus carrying out the purposes for which the Federal reserve act was created."

This resolution was called to the attention of the officers of the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district located in Dallas, Tex. Latterly the matters mentioned in this resolution, besides others relative to the administration of the affairs of the bank, were presented in amplified form and at various sittings of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank in Dallas. Protests came from various sections of the eleventh Federal reserve district.

The board of directors of the bank by a divided vote at a meeting January 13, 1928, decided to continue the policies, of which complaints have been made, as evidenced in the reelection of the executive officers who administer the affairs of this special institution.

At a meeting of the executive board of the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, held in Fort Worth, Tex., January 19, 1928, the general manager of the organization submitted his report, in which the information of the unyielding attitude of the board of directors of the eleventh district was given.

Upon motion the president was instructed to appoint a special committee to consider this situation. This motion was adopted by a unanimous vote, and the following well-known west Texans were named:

C. B. Jones, Spur; W. M. Massie, Fort Worth; O. P. Thrane, Snyder; P. B. Ralls, Ralls; V. A. Robinson, Post.

After due consideration the committee submitted the following resolution, which was adopted by a unanimous vote:

Whereas at a meeting of the executive board of the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, held at Cisco, Tex., June 13, 1927, a resolution was passed requesting the Federal Reserve Board to adopt permissible flexible rules in dealing with member banks located in agricultural sections of the country; and

Whereas the management of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas in the administration of the affairs of said bank has shown itself to be completely out of harmony with and entirely unsympathetic toward smaller banking institutions, which attitude is inimical to the agricultural and livestock interests of the territory served by said Federal reserve bank; and

Whereas such policies and practices in the administration of the affairs of said bank have worked many hardships on the farming and livestock interests of the Southwest and have seriously hampered the development of the most rapidly developing section of this country, and a continuation thereof will work further hardships and will seriously retard the development of such sections of this country and may force a return by the farming and livestock interests to the old system with its burdensome rates of interest to the almost irreparable injury of the agricultural and livestock interests in the territory included in the eleventh Federal reserve district; and

Whereas such policies and practices are wholly inimical to the letter and spirit of the Federal reserve bank act and the purpose to be attained in the establishment of the Federal reserve system; and

Whereas the board of directors of said bank by its recent action has publicly stated that in the administration of the affairs of said bank they will follow the same policies in the future that they have followed in the past: Now therefore be it

Resolved, by the board of directors of the West Texas Chamber of Commerce this day in proper meeting assembled, That we deplore such action and declare ourselves to be in full and complete sympathy and accord with the protesting bankers in their opposition to such policies; and be it further

Resolved, That we feel that the only source of relief that can now be looked to from the ills attendant upon the policies pursued in the future by the management of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas must of necessity come from the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That this board will look with favor upon any resolution which might be introduced in Congress with its purpose being a congressional investigation of the affairs of the Federal reserve bank of the eleventh district and the administration of its officers in the control of such institution; and be it further

Resolved, That we here and now declare ourselves to be in full favor and accord with what is known as the Federal reserve bank act in letter as well as in spirit, but only complain of the method and manner in which the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas has been managed and its affairs administered; and be it further

Resolved, That the manager of this body be instructed to furnish each and every Member of Congress, whose district or a part thereof is located in the eleventh Federal reserve district, with a copy of this resolution, and that a copy be furnished to the public press and that the same be spread on the minutes of this organization.

* * * * * * *

These facts and resolutions are submitted to you with the earnest hope that you will give them the consideration they deserve, and join in this effort to bring the Federal reserve act into the practical and constructive use for which it was created.

Respectfully submitted.

WEST TEXAS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
HOMER D. WADE, Manager.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I submit a resolution calling for an investigation of the matters complained of in the communication from Mr. Wade.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 152) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the affairs of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., have been administered in a manner which has worked many hardships on the farming and livestock interests in the territory included in the eleventh Federal reserve district; and

Whereas it is alleged that there is a lack of cooperation on the part of the governor of such bank with member banks in the rural communities; and

Whereas it is desirable to bring about a conclusion of the controversy in order to do justice to all concerned: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the administration of the affairs of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Tex., and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable. For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF ST. ELIZABETHS HOSPITAL

Mr. HEFLIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 153), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas in the memorandum opinion of Mr. Justice Hoehling in the case of Hanna J. Cook in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia there was suggested the possibility that over 5,000 persons, since July, 1913, have been illegally committed to the Government hospital for the insane, located in the District of Columbia and known as St. Elizabeths Hospital; and

Whereas in the report of J. R. McCarl, Comptroller General of the United States, made in pursuance of House Concurrent Resolution 26, Sixty-ninth Congress, it was set forth (1) that since July 1, 1916, 20 patients in such hospital have been killed by attendants and that no convictions were had in respect of any such cases, (2) that since such date 30 patients in such hospital have committed suicide, and (3) that the expenses of such hospital increased from $1,194,476.28 for the year 1919 to $2,237,093.71 for the year 1921, an increase of nearly 100 per cent in two years, during which period there was an increase of less than 3 per cent in the number of patients under treatment in such hospital; and

Whereas the activities of Dr. W. A. White, superintendent of such hospital, Dr. D. Percy Hickling, physician in charge of the psychopathic department of Gallinger Municipal Hospital, and W. H. Wahly, assistant corporation counsel for the District of Columbia, in the case of Margaret M. Roche, a former war nurse, as set forth in an article entitled, "Strange insanity in Washington" in the magazine Plain Talk for February, 1928, constituted conspiracy falsely to imprison Margaret M. Roche in St. Elizabeths Hospital; and

Whereas several hundred World War veterans in such hospital were transferred to other institutions following the resignation of F. A. Fenning as Commissioner of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas F. A. Fenning, on or about October 23, 1926, made a request in writing of Maj. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, that certain veterans who were inmates of St. Elizabeths Hospital be removed to other institutions for the convenience of the said Fenning; and

Whereas William J. O'Brien, veteran of the Indian wars, has been confined in St. Elizabeths Hospital for over 30 years, 23 of such years in Howard Hall, the ward for the criminally insane, although he has never been convicted of any crime and there is doubt that he is insane; and

Whereas the courts of the District of Columbia adjudicate nonresidents of the District of Columbia to be insane, incarcerate them in St. Elizabeths indefinitely, appoint trustees for their estates, and charge such estates for maintenance and alleged treatment of such nonresidents: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of the Senate, composed of five members appointed by the President of the Senate, three of whom shall be from the majority party (including one Progressive Republican) and two of whom shall be from the minority party, is authorized and directed to inquire into and investigate the administration of St. Elizabeths Hospital, particularly with respect to alleged mistreatment of patients in such hospital and illegal commitments thereto.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee shall not exceed $——— and shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee. The committee shall, as soon as practicable, report its findings to the Senate with such recommendations as it deems proper.

APPOINTMENTS AND DISMISSALS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. HEFLIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 154), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas William C. Deming, president of the Civil Service Commission, admitted in an article published in the Washington Post of March 6, 1927, that the Civil Service Commission had appointed in excess of quotas over 10,000 persons from the District of Columbia, Maryland, Virginia, and other States; and

Whereas many legally appointed civil-service employees from States whose quotas are in arrears, and many ex-service men and women, have been illegally separated from the service, and much suffering and hardship caused thereby, terminating in some cases in commitments to St. Elizabeths Hospital, and in other cases in suicide; and

Whereas the morale and efficiency of many of the executive departments and independent establishments of the Government have been completely broken down by the injustice, discrimination, intimidation, and illegal dismissals in the civil service and much loss to the Government caused by the resulting maladministration of the laws: Therefore be it

Resolved, That there is hereby created a special committee of the Senate, to consist of five Members appointed by the President of the Senate, three of whom shall be from the majority party (including one Progressive Republican), and two of whom shall be from the minority party. The committee is authorized and directed to investigate illegal appointments and dismissals in the civil service since July 1, 1919. The committee shall meet and organize within five days from the date of appointment, and immediately thereafter shall begin hearings upon this resolution. Within 60 days after the adoption of this resolution the committee shall report to the Senate concerning such illegal appointments and dismissals in the civil service, and shall include in its report such recommendation for legislation and suggested action for the removal from office of any parties to such illegality as it deems advisable to correct abuses in appointments and dismissals in the civil service.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, including the records of the Civil Service Commission, the Bureau of the Budget, the Bureau of Efficiency, the Personnel Classification Board, and the several executive departments and independent establishments, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee shall not exceed $———, and shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE AT HABANA

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the Washington Post on yesterday contained a short editorial relating to the Habana conference. I think it is of interest. I therefore ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

THE HABANA CONFERENCE

The Pan American conference at Habana was unable to make itself useful until the intractable Argentinian delegate, Doctor Pueyrredon, had eliminated himself. It then dropped the nonsensical attempt to modify international law in respect to "intervention," shelved the Pueyrredon scheme for transferring tariff powers to the Pan American Union, and agreed upon a program of arbitration of the most advanced kind. The conference, instead of attempting to draw up arbitration compacts, referred the subject to a special conference to be held in Washington within a year. In the meantime drafts of the proposed treaties will be drawn up.

It is proposed by the Habana conference that the republics of America adopt obligatory arbitration; and that treaties be drawn up with minimum exceptions which may be considered indispensable to safeguard the independence and domestic interests of the states concerned, as well as excluding matters affecting states not parties to the treaty.

This is a program that is gladly accepted by the United States. This Government is willing to make treaties with all American Republics similar to that now pending between the United States and France. By means of such treaties, all questions properly susceptible of adjustment by arbitration can and will be submitted to arbitration; and at the same time the independence of each nation will be safe, and its jurisdiction over purely domestic questions, such as tariffs, immigration, etc., will remain unimpaired.

The Pan American Conference is about to adjourn. The discussions have been useful in exposing the falsity of the charge that the United States is aggressive and imperialistic in its attitude toward its neighbors. When the Argentine delegate stubbornly blocked all agreements in an attempt to place the United States in a false position his own Government called him to account. He chose to resign as delegate and as ambassador to Washington rather than abandon his effort to make it appear that the United States pursues a policy of deliberate and unprovoked intervention in the affairs of other nations. No doubt he has a small following in Latin-American countries, but the Governments of those Republics have no sympathy with his attitude, and the Habana conference was glad to get rid of him.

The United States comes from Habana with the unimpaired friendship of its neighbors. The delegates with very few exceptions recognized the fact that this is a workaday world and that the United States can not avoid carrying the heavier portion of the burden of maintaining the principle of popular government in this hemisphere. When governments break down by interior corruption and bankruptcy, or by exterior aggression from neighbors or overseas powers, the United States stands ready to befriend them, to lift them up again, and restore to their peoples the power to govern themselves.

In making these matters clear the delegates of Cuba, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and Nicaragua were very influential with their colleagues. Dr. Orestes Ferrara spoke with great force and timeliness at one stage of the proceedings, dissuading the conference from making an unwise commitment on the question of revolutions and interventions. He pointed out that Cuba would not have come into existence but for revolution, as, indeed, was the case with most of the Republics, including the United States; and that the intervention of the United States had been the salvation of Cuba. This historic truth, uttered in the capital of Cuba, with the self-governing Republic of Cuba as an exhibit in verification of the disinterested friendship of the United States, was an overwhelming refutation of the charge that the United States is bent upon aggression and imperialism.

Cuba, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and Nicaragua stand as living proof that the United States is their unselfish friend. Two of these Republics have regained stability and complete independence with the help of the United States. The third is well on its way to stabilized independence; and Nicaragua is soon to choose its own government, after having been relieved of foreign intrigue and aggression. The United States has performed these services without thought of aggression or interference in the domestic affairs of those countries. When it has performed its duty it will withdraw from Haiti and Nicaragua, as it has done from Cuba and Santo Domingo. The world has rarely witnessed such proof of unselfish friendship on the part of one nation toward others. The Habana conference has recognized the true situation, and its action demonstrates that the American Republics have faith in the friendly and disinterested intentions of the United States.

FORMER SENATOR ASBURY C. LATIMER, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, 20 years ago to-day former Senator Asbury Churchwell Latimer passed away. I have an editorial and article relating to him from his home paper, the Belton News, Belton, S. C., February 16, 1928, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASBURY CHURCHWELL LATIMER

Twenty years ago next Monday, Belton, S. C., and the United States lost a great citizen and one of its truly great men. Elsewhere in this issue we have tried to crowd into several columns a brief summary and appreciation of his useful life, services to the public, and remarkable achievements.

Asbury Churchwell Latimer was one of America's and the people's noblest champions. He was modest, tireless, cheerful worker for his fellow men. His was a fruitful life of honorable service and usefulness for mankind, the South, and the Nation. For almost 16 years he was a Member of the Congress of the United States, and many are the splendid legislative proposals he started or helped start on their way to enactment that mean so much to us of this generation and that will mean so very much to our children and our children's children and their children.

The welfare of the farmers was especially close to his heart. In Congress he showed exceptional foresight. Among many other things he was a pioneer in the good-roads movement, blazing the way for the very plan now law, and as result of which we now have better roads and better streets, and are destined to enjoy still better; and as a result of which we can not help most respectfully and most earnestly suggesting that one of the most important of these wonderful highways bear his name and be a monument to his memory.

SHORT SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF FORMER UNITED STATES SENATOR A. C. LATIMER

Among the successful men who have gone before stands the life, achievements, and character of the Hon. Asbury Churchwell Latimer, of Belton, S. C.

His name was well known, not only in upper South Carolina but throughout the State and Nation a little more than one-third of a century ago. Space permits only to recall some of the constructive work he placed ineffaceably upon the pages of his country's history. It is well to remind those who are now living of the debt this generation owes to the past, so that it may profit by the worthy example of such good and useful citizens and statesmen as was A. C. Latimer. His entire life illustrates America's equal opportunities and ought to be an inspiration to every earnest, ambitious youth of the land.

He was born July 31, 1851, near Lowndesville, Abbeville County, S. C., and died on Thursday, 9.15 a. m., February 20, 1908, in Providence Hospital, Washington, D. C., leaving to mourn his loss a wife, one son, William Carroll Latimer, and four daughters, Mamie, Anna, Olive, and Sara, all of whom have been a credit to their parents. The son died last March in Atlanta.

Asbury Churchwell Latimer was a son of Clement T. and Beulah Young Latimer, being one of seven children; four boys and three girls. Brought up on his father's farm, he devoted most of his life to agricultural pursuits and the welfare of the farmers and the people generally. His education was limited to the common schools of that day, when farmer boys rode or walked sometimes as far as 5 miles morning and afternoon and were glad to have such a privilege.

At an early age we find him actively engaged in public affairs, taking a prominent part in the memorable campaign of 1876 as an ardent supporter of Gen. Wade Hampton for governor. Hampton appointed him on his gubernatorial staff, but he declined to serve for business and for personal reasons.

On June 26, 1877, he was happily married to Miss Sara Alice Brown, a daughter of Dr. W. Carroll Brown, of Belton, who was prominent and a leader in all affairs for the good of the town, country, and State. Doctor Brown was a brother of Joseph E. Brown, Georgia's famous war governor and postwar United States Senator.

His wife brought to her husband beauty, refinement, inspiration, counsel, and culture. She still survives him and lives at the old homestead at Belton, doing good and enjoying the fruits of a well-spent life, within the shadows of her father's and mother's home, where she recalls the happy days of her girlhood and sees, with pride and satisfaction, her children and grandchildren take their places in busy walks of life, without fear of the future. Such is the useful life, and one worthy of emulation by those who must take on the work of our churches, schools, and civic affairs.

A. C. Latimer moved from Abbeville County to Anderson County in 1880, where he built at Belton a splendid home, which is still maintained by his widow, and where she continues the generous hospitality he dispensed while devoted to farming and public affairs.

He was considered by his friends and neighbors a safe and sane advisor on public problems and a prudent, thrifty farmer, with practical ideas, and plenty of energy, all of which brought to him success in his agricultural and other undertakings.

Renewing his interest in public affairs in 1888, he opposed the third party movement, urged getting control of existing party machinery, and was elected county chairman of the Democratic Party of Anderson County in 1890, and was reelected in 1892. He declined candidacy for lieutenant governor in 1890, when the reform movement swept the State from center to circumference, but in 1892 was forced to become a candidate for Congress against the Hon. George Johnstone, of Newberry, one of the ablest lawyers and best speakers in the State, and whose reelection was conceded. Mr. Latimer's appeal was forceful and direct to the voters themselves. Even in that campaign Mr. Latimer outstripped Mr. Johnstone and proved to be one of the best campaigners this State has produced, and was elected to the Fifty-third Congress and reelected four successive times, and in 1902 he offered for the Senate and was successful in a hotly contested race with Senator John L. McLaurin, Gov. John Gary Evans, and others, and began his term of service as United States Senator on March 4, 1903.

His work in the House of Representatives at Washington was noted for his perseverance and aggressiveness in the interest of the farmers and the people.

Among other things, he worked for the advancement of the Free Rural Delivery Service, and extended it in every way possible. In fact, he may be considered the father of this enterprise.

At the same time he advocated parcel post, direct election of United States Senators, the direct primary, and many other Democratic measures which are now law.

* * * * * * *

In the Senate he continued his efforts directing his attention, among other things, more particularly, to good roads. He was such a strong advocate of good roads that he was sometimes called "Good Roads Latimer." The country now enjoys the fruit of his labors, far and wide. When he was sent on the immigration commission to Europe he gathered information and made a study of European roads, with a view to arousing further interest here in the good-roads movement. While traveling out there he also observed the various qualities of soil and their adaptability to the growth of certain crops.

The remarkable thing about A. C. Latimer was that he had no legislative experience when he went to Congress, but succeeded in all his legislative activities remarkably and to a degree almost without any parallel. One of his neighbors once told me he doubted whether Mr. Latimer had ever spoken publicly except at a Sunday school or religious meeting when he offered for Congress.

Many nice things have always been said about him by his neighbors. All agree he was a man of splendid habits; that he always exercised deference and consideration for others; that he was a good man; a practical man; an ideal husband and most thoughtful father.

Some with whom I have talked felt he must have had more of an education in his early days than he let on or has been credited with, arguing that he always expressed himself so well and forcefully and correctly; and always showed all the niceties of an educated gentleman. But I doubt his having more of the meager education than practically all boys of his particular time had. Coming along into manhood just at the close of the great war, with slave property swept away, his father was almost ruined, and he, like all other boys had to buckle down to the day's work. The fact that he did not have literary training only attests the fact of his wonderful native or mother endowment. His son told me on one occasion that his father seemed to see through a proposition quicker than any man he knew. We remember once when going out west of Belton to make a survey for him that we came to a huge pile of wood of various lengths on one of his farms that had been hauled out. He jumped out of the buggy and with a short tape line began to measure to ascertain the number of cords in it. We saw his intentions and got out our surveyor's chain, and he immediately turned the job over to us and went about something else.

His pastor, after his death had this to say of him: "In the death of Senator Latimer, South Carolina Methodism has lost one of her most prominent members and staunchest friends. The Belton Church has lost a tower of strength. Brother Latimer was not only a liberal contributor to the church, both at home and abroad, but he was its wise counselor and sincere friend. The people had confidence in his religious life. His public prayers were very earnest and touching. Often have I seen him and many of the congregation bathed in tears after what might be called one of his face-to-face talks with God. He loved to talk with his friends on religious subjects. His conversion was clear-cut and unquestioned. He never lost his hold on God."

One of his distinguished congressional colleagues in paying tribute to his memory said on the floor of Congress: "In the beginning of his career in Congress Senator Latimer was far more familiar with Clark's Commentaries on the Bible and the rules of the Methodist Episcopal Church, than he was with the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House of Representatives."

The late Hugh Wilson, editor of the Press and Banner, of Abbeville, S. C., who knew him from his birth to his death, wrote, editorially: "Senator Latimer's biography would read like a romance. Left, as a result of the war, with little means, he did not have the advantages of a collegiate or even a good high-school education, yet with this handicap he attained the highest position within the gift of the people of his State. He knew the channel of his adaptability, and he broadened the scope year by year. Heedless of the small talk of his unfitness that was indulged in by many in the early part of his political career, he bent himself to the task of improving himself, and how well he has done it, the record shows."

His neighbors loved him, as was evidenced by the great number who gathered at the depot at Belton and awaited in silence the arrival of the special congressional train that bore his body from Washington, and then through the intervening hours viewing his body as it lay in the church so quietly and so much like his former self; and through the ceremony as provided in the book of discipline and at the grave until the last word was said committing his body to the grave, "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." Another touching scene was the more than 50 negroes at the church, who were permitted to take a last look at his remains.

This is but a brief history of the life of one whose activities were so great and numerous. His father, Clement T. Latimer, was born on Hogskin Creek, not far west of the town of Due West, Abbeville County, in 1818, and was one of 11 children, whose dscendants are scattered far and wide, many of whom rose to high positions of trust and honor. Doctor Latimer, who was president of Davidson College; Doctor Burts, of the Baptist Church; Dr. C. E. Burts, who was born and reared near Honea Path; and many others too numerous to mention all had a common Latimer origin.

To those of us who remain to look back down the dim vista of time it is pleasing to remember men who have overcome such handicaps and have climbed the ladder of distinction, fame, honor, and public services, as did A. C. Latimer, and all of whose family have done so much in maintaining his high ideals in all matters pertaining to the common good of the country. His name will long be remembered by people of this section and the Nation.

W. L. MITCHELL.

HONEA PATH, S. C., December 28, 1927.

The above appeared in the Anderson Daily Mail, December 30, 1927, except for a few verbal changes we have made. The author is one of our oldest and most respected citizens. He knew Senator Latimer personally and intimately, and has given us of the younger generation a well worth-while picture of this one of South Carolina's and Anderson County's most distinguished citizens.

While we did not have the pleasure and privilege of knowing the Senator personally and intimately, as Mr. W. L. Mitchell did, we do know something of him as a public man and of his great public service to the State and Nation, and that he was a statesman of the first magnitude, beyond the reach of any group, interest, or "influence." We merely wish to mention a few things the printed record of his time show.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that on January 8, 1904, he was the first to introduce a resolution in the Senate calling on the Secretary of Agriculture to obtain and furnish the Senate with road-building data with reference to the comparative cost of constructing public highways in the United States and in foreign countries. Among many speeches he made on January 14, 1904, a forceful, carefully prepared argument in favor of generous appropriations for road improvement, concluding with the following:

"Having dealt with this subject at greater length than I expected and having given many of my reasons for advocating this measure, it only remains to add in behalf of the rural people of the State which I in part represent and of the country at large, whose interest and prosperity are the mainspring of my public life and ambition, that we are expecting the best at the hands of Congress. With each succeeding day the sentiment for national aid is growing stronger.

"It is a reform that is bound to take place in time and, in my opinion, within the near future. Should it be defeated now it must be the hope of the people until it is accomplished. The call is from every farmhouse and country home in this broad land of ours. It is 'the cry from Macedonia.' Will we fail to heed it when nothing prevents? With all other good citizens of this great Republic, I have an abiding faith in the justice and patriotism of the Congress of the United States; and from its exalted character the best wisdom of the Nation may be confidently expected."

What a wonderful prophecy made on the floor of the Senate 23 years ago! And for it too he was severely criticized then, only to be as highly praised now. Since that time millions upon millions of dollars have been spent by the Federal Government for the construction of national and State public highways, until to-day it would be impossible for the day's work to be done or public business to proceed but for Federal aid in the construction of national and State public highways, the consummation of the very thing Latimer then proposed.

All this looks easy as we look back upon it, but it must be remembered that he was most roundly criticized then and even grossly belittled and ridiculed by the Columbia State, the News and Courier, and other South Carolina papers for his advanced and wise views not only on good roads but also for his sound attitude on foreign immigration, and on other important questions, just emerging for solution and epochal national and State action.

At the very time he began urging Federal aid for roads and for swamp drainage certain South Carolina metropolitan newspapers, with a unanimity that was not accidental and that aroused suspicion of a common purpose and common selfish origin went so far as to say:

"As an appeal to farmers not well posted the good-roads stunt may go some distance, but the practical man in Washington knows Senator Latimer is wasting his time trying to advance a measure of its kind. He probably knows it. His good-roads proposition would require millions of Government money. The chances are the northern and western farmers would get nearly all the money—at least, so long as the Republican Party controls the Government," etc., etc.

Equally studied and equally subtle was the attitude of the State, the News and Courier, and certain other city newspapers to his courageous opposition to the State bureau of immigration, the head of which had even gone abroad and brought here two shiploads of immigrants. Senator Latimer strenuously objected at once to the expenditure of large sums of money for inducing and bringing foreign immigrants into South Carolina.

To their arguments in favor of white foreigners "to insure white supremacy" here, and "in order to develop our resources and plant our untilled acres," he promptly pointed out that our own natural increase in population had better be relied on; that we already had one race problem, which ought not be added to; that he was unalterably opposed to paying the steamship fares of foreigners here to produce more cotton and further reduce the price; and that immigration restriction would bring about (as it has done) a better balance in the proportion of whites and blacks by causing a migration of the negroes North, where a taste of the negro problem would bring about a better understanding of and a more sympathetic attitude toward us and our race problem.

And so we find him on this important immigration problem that Congress has just now taken most drastic action on, in advance of his colleagues and opposed by certain leading papers of our State which had been, up to his and Tillman's day, charged with trying to run our State government in the interest of the few instead of the many. In 1906–7 in the face of the concentrated criticism of the Columbia State, the Charleston News and Courier, and certain other papers, and on the eve of his candidacy for reelection we find him the first and about the only public man in the State for a while opposing the State bureau of immigration with whose abolition his opposition is credited, the repealing act even forbidding any State official to bring an alien into our midst.

In the Senate he did not hesitate to serve on the Senate Committee on Immigration, a committee most Senators sought to avoid because of the "political dynamite" involved, owing to the large racial, religious, cheap labor, transportation, real estate, and other selfish interests affected.

Although a minority member of that committee—the Republicans being in control—he was very active in trying to perfect and put real teeth in the lengthy and pretentious bill (S. 4403) his committee reported in 1906 to the Senate. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23, 1906, discloses his efforts in committee and also shows that he renewed his activities on the floor of the Senate to perfect and make effective that restriction law.

Among other amendments, we find him pressing one in the Senate debates, when the bill was considered, which it is difficult to understand was not at the time adopted. The Senator concluded that the chief and controlling reason for the large number of alien and foreign-born paupers, insane, criminals, and the like filling northern institutions was due to the profit-making choice of the foreign steamship companies and so told the Senate. He offered an amendment fining the steamships for bringing here such objectionables so heavily (when their undesirability could have been ascertained by a competent inquiry on the part of the steamship agents who sold the tickets) that the fines would take all the profit out of that particular kind of nefarious business on their part. In pressing his steamship-fines amendment, which, although not then adopted, is substantially the law now, Senator Latimer repeatedly spoke, drawing the fire of practically all of the old-line conservatives, and, among other things, said:

"I think every Senator present will admit that the evil [of dumping on us alien paupers, alien insane, aliens dangerously and contageously diseased, alien criminals, and the like] is due to the profit in it to the foreign steamship companies. If you take out the profit of bringing the excluded classes here, you will take away the incentive," and thus easily destroy one of the greatest of our immigration evils.

As a result of his good work and active interest in the question, Vice President Fairbanks, who was one of the few real restrictionist Republicans in the Senate, appointed him as the only Democratic Senator on the United States Immigration Commission in 1907. The commission made a most thorough and searching investigation into conditions at home and abroad, the Senator immediately plunging into the work, spending the entire summer of 1907 in Europe, looking into conditions and getting first-hand data. The 42-volume report of the commission contains the findings and recommendations upon which our present laws and restriction policy are based, and it is interesting to note that his fellow members were of the opinion that his duties on that important commission, and the extra work it entailed, unquestionably shortened his life and hastened his untimely death, February 20, 1908, and that the "Latimer" legislative proposals on immigration, as well as on good roads, parcel-post, and other great matters, are now substantially the "law of the land," and constitute a monument to his statesmanship and vision that place him in the front ranks of the distinguished men of this State and Nation.

PUBLIC UTILITY CORPORATIONS

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the course of the debate which occupied some considerable time during the past week the statement was made that no public utility company had ever defaulted on its bonds. I send to the desk and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD an editorial from a paper printed in Portland, Oreg., speaking of the foreclosure of the bonds of a public utility company with attendant circumstances, reported to be somewhat scandalous in character.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

HIGH TIME TO CLEAN HOUSE

"How much longer must the bondholders bear the heavy burden of this receivership?"

In pleading the cause of the bondholders of the Vernonia Light & Power Co. in the circuit court the other day B. E. Haney, attorney for the bondholders, addressed this question to the court.

When he asked the question the company had been in receivership a year and a half.

During that period the company had had three different receivers.

During that period the company had been subjected to suits for accounting, suits to remove the receivers, and a suit to foreclose the bonds on its property.

And the end is not yet.

To be exact, Vernonia Light & Power Co. went into receivership in May, 1926.

The Northwest Trust Co., which had organized and financed the light and power company and which owned all of its stock, went into receivership with it on the same date.

BOND ISSUE FLOATED

In financing the light and power company the trust company had floated a bond issue of $125,000 on the light and power company's property.

The trust company named itself as trustee for the bonds, thereby placing itself in the novel position of becoming a trustee for bonds constituting a lien on its own property.

A single receiver was appointed by Judge Stevenson to administer the affairs of both companies.

Scarcely had he assumed office before a group of stockholders and bondholders attacked his appointment on the ground that he could not legally administer the affairs of two companies, one of which was a debtor and the other a creditor. They also alleged that the company's assets and income were being dissipated.

Then a curious thing happened.

The court removed the trust company as trustee for the bonds and made the largest individual bondholders their trustee.

The court also removed the receiver, but appointed another in his stead.

The bondholders again protested the receivership on the same ground, but the court continued the second receiver until he resigned.

Then the court appointed a third receiver to succeed him.

The bondholders resumed their fight against this third receiver and they are still battling.

BRING FORECLOSURE SUIT

The bondholders also brought a foreclosure suit and it is still pending.

Next a petition was filed for an order for an examination of the books, and following a fistic encounter between opposing counsel, it was finally granted by the court.

Meanwhile the salaries of the receiver and his staff of financial and legal parasites have been consuming the revenue of the light and power company.

It was brought out in the argument on the petition for the removal of the receiver the other day that the company has a gross monthly revenue of $2,200, an operating expense of $700, leaving a net income of $1,500.

But instead of this income being applied to the indebtedness of the company, it is being consumed by the receiver and his corps of financial and legal sharks.

BLAME POLITICAL GANG

In other words, with the sanction of the court the light and power company has been and is being milked dry for the benefit of a political gang that avails itself of every opportunity presented to prey on litigants and business.

The whole affair is a travesty on justice and a disgrace to the Multnomah County circuit bench.

It ought not to be the question of how much longer the light and power company bondholders shall continue to be a victim of this legal farce, but how much longer the people of Multnomah County will stand for the administration of their legal affairs in this shameful and disgraceful manner.

It would seem to be high time to begin cleaning house on the Multnomah County circuit bench.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the same connection I send to the desk a brief letter, sent to me by one of the judges of the district court of the State of Montana, on a related subject, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT COURT, EIGHTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Great Falls, Mont., February 12, 1928.

DEAR TOM: I notice by the press that you are going to conduct an inquiry into the public-utility business. In this connection I want to tell you that I bought 240 shares of Arcadia Utility Co. stock at $12.50 per share last June through Eddie Hardin, of the Financial Mirror, Wall Street, New York, and the stock proved worthless. It is now in the hands of Cameron Michel Co., 8 West Fortieth Street, New York. I thought this news might help you in your investigation.

Sincerely,

STEVE COWLEY, Judge.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the general subject seems to be agitating the State of Massachusetts at the present time. I send to the desk and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD an editorial from the Boston Evening American and another editorial from the Boston Post.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Boston Evening American, February 15, 1928]

ATTWILL ON "HOGS"—PLAIN TALK OF ELECTRIC-LIGHT COMPANIES

Chairman Henry C. Attwill's plain talk to the "hogs" among the electric lighting companies of Massachusetts will have the good effect of focusing public attention upon one of the major issues which are to be fought out before the present legislature.

The Worcester Electric Light Co., which last year paid its shareholders 24 per cent on the par value of their stock, was ordered by the public-utilities board to reduce its rate from 7 cents to 5 cents per kilowatt-hour, effective on July 15 last.

This reduction the Worcester Co. refused and refuses to make. It continues to charge 40 per cent more, or 7 cents per kilowatt-hour. Having obtained a district court injunction, restraining the commission from enforcing its order, an appeal now is on its way to the highest court in the land.

Confronted by this bold attempt to override the regulatory powers of the Commonwealth, the public-utilities board, with the support of Governor Fuller, is asking for legislation under which gas and electric companies are to enter into contract with the State and agree to become subject to regulation and supervision.

Gas and electric companies can not be "compelled" to enter into such a contract, but what if they refuse?

They will find themselves blocked at every turn. Further issues of their shares will not be approved. They will lose the power to take private property by right of eminent domain. They no longer will be protected from plants owned and operated by the public.

In the past two or three years a great many electric companies, formerly owned locally, have passed to the control of absentees.

With the stock of other similar organizations, the shares of these companies have found their way into the treasuries of holding companies.

Bonds, preferred stock, and various other kinds of shares have been issued by the holding companies and sold to the public, those who dominate the holding companies retaining the common or voting shares.

In many instances control has in this way passed to holding companies outside the State. It is these companies in particular which are fighting (1) the regulatory power of Massachusetss, and (2) the effort of the governor and his public-utility commissioners to bring the "hogs" into line.

No one except a man of the Attwill type could have talked as plainly of the porcine gentlemen who are running the holding-company game as he did and escaped without the instant cry of "demagogue."

Attwill is a distinguished attorney, respected for his "law" as well as his courage. He is a former attorney general of the Commonwealth, a member of one of the oldest families in Essex County.

He knows the public-utilities industry inside and out. Hear what he says, not of all electric lighting companies, but of the "hogs" among them!

"We have given these utilities a monopoly. We have given to their care the sovereign power of eminent domain and have protected them against competition.

"We have now come to the place where some of these monopolies resent the idea that the rates should be made reasonable and that the public should share in their prosperity.

"These utilities can not continue to boast and brag of their ability to serve the public better and do it more efficiently than the public can do for themselves, unless some of them can approach somewhere near the efficiency of the municipal companies and give the public somewhere near as low rates as the municipal companies of Massachusetts have demonstrated that they can furnish.

"Certainly the private companies have nothing to boast about on their rates when we contrast the rate of one publicly owned company at Holyoke with that of any private company in the State.

"If there are no privately operated companies that can approximate the rates that the Holyoke Municipal Co. is now giving—5 cents a kilowatt-hour, and making a handsome return upon its investment at this rate—then it seems to me that the field of the private utility is gone in this State, or else I mistake very much the temper and character of the people.

"We have got to a place where, if what these companies say is true, regulation in Massachusetts, as far as rates are concerned, is ineffective."

And what was said on behalf of the "hogs"?

Able attorneys called the public utilities bill "an attempt to forestall an adverse decision by the Supreme Court of the United States." Companies were going to be "forced at the point of a pistol" to give up their "constitutional rights." It was "an attempt to nullify the Constitution of the United States by indirection," an "attempt to evade and destroy."

To which the Commonwealth, through the chairman of its public-utilities board, made reply as follows:

"The constitutional law that these gentlemen like to prattle about is in the last analysis determined by public sentiment. A true economic principle will never be overthrown by a decision of the Supreme Court. The battle for the freedom of the slaves was not stopped by the Dred Scott decision.

"One of the saddest things that we can conceive is that the fourteenth amendment, passed to abolish human slavery, has been turned into machinery to guarantee economic slavery.

"You must pass this bill or the people of Massachusetts must realize that they have no protection from corporate greed. Else they must depend on the kindness, the generosity, the philanthropy of these gentlemen." (Indicating public-utility executives and their attorneys.)

"We are not asking for charity from these gentlemen who want to make 40 per cent, or 50, or possibly even 60 per cent.

"Think of it! Here is a company, amply able to meet the 5-cent rate of the Holyoke Municipal Co., taking the position that they ought to receive in the market, if they sell, nine times the par value of their stock, which means that to make it worth that they have to charge rates to yield 54 per cent on the par value of the stock.

"Do you think the public is going to stand for it? This bill is an attempt to preserve to the decent public utilities the privileges that they are likely to lose through the activities of the hogs."

From time to time the Boston Evening American has been pointing to the example of the Holyoke Electric Co., owned by the people, and asking why no private system has matched its 5-cent rate.

We are glad to have the public-utilities board join in that query. We are even more encouraged by the implication behind Mr. Attwill's declaration that "in the public-utilities department we are unanimous in agreeing that the public will be forced into public operation, by which the greed of some of the electric companies can be curbed."

With the people fully informed as to the significance of this battle there can be but one result. If there is anyone in the State big enough to act for the power people our advice would be to cut the Worcester rate without delay, refund the Worcester overcharge, and promise to be good.

[From the Boston Post, February 15, 1928]

QUARRELING WITH THE STATE

It seems strange that after years of successful regulation of public utilities in Massachusetts we should be faced with a situation which, according to Chairman Attwill, of the public-utilities commission, renders the State helpless to enforce its commands.

Mr. Attwill declares the lighting rates throughout the State are, in many cases, exorbitant and some companies are bleeding the public, piling up extortionate profits.

If this state of affairs can be remedied by legislation, it should be done promptly.

The unfortunate part of the whole business seems to be that, owing to certain United States Supreme Court decisions, we are in for a prolonged series of law suits. The public utilities have recently obtained decided legal advantages which conflict sharply with our long-established Massachusetts doctrines.

Our local utilities have prospered greatly under our State laws and regulations. No utilities of the kind in the country are in a stronger financial condition than the Massachusetts companies. Common sense ought to show the stockholders of these companies the necessity of remaining on good terms with the State instead of challenging the authorities to legal battle.

Whether it is possible, indirectly, to deprive the utilities of their legal right to appeal to the United States courts we do not know. That will be a matter for the lawyers. But it seems foolish tactics on the part of the utility stockholders to engage in a quarrel with the State.

Meanwhile the position of the public-utilities commission ought to be strengthened by legislation in order that no possible advantage to the power of the State shall be missed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I suppose the Senator from Montana has reference to a statement made by me in the course of my remarks in the Senate last week. My statement was that the record made before the Interstate Commerce Committee showed that there had been no default on any of the preferred stock or any of the securities issued by the utility companies. I did not state it as a fact. I said that it so appeared on the record of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee and without dispute in that hearing. I said nothing, as I recollect, about stocks except the preferred stocks and the bonds and other obligations to pay, and the record before the Interstate Commerce Committee, in which I did not participate, not being a member of that committee, does show that no default had been made in any of the preferred stocks or bonds or obligations to pay, and there was no contradiction of that showing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 16, 1928:

S. 2656. An act to establish a minimum area for a Shenandoah National Park, for administration, protection, and general development by the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

On February 20, 1928:

S. 2348. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Norfolk & Western Railway Co. and Knox Creek Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate two bridges across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River near Devon, Mingo County, W. Va.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SEVILLE, SPAIN (S. DOC. NO. 59)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the accompanying recommendation of the Secretary of State, I request of the Congress legislation that will authorize the appropriations heretofore made or hereafter to be made under the authority of Public Resolution No. 65, approved March 3, 1925, providing for the participation of the United States in an international exposition to be held at Seville, Spain, to be expended, for the purposes enumerated in the resolution, without regard to the provisions of any other act relating to the expenditure of public moneys, on the certificate of the Secretary of State that the materials or services were necessary to enable the Government of the United States to participate in the exposition.

The attention of Congress is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State and the memorandum of the Commission of the United States to the International Exposition at Seville, in which the details with regard to the necessity of the proposed amendment are set forth.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 20, 1928.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred, as indicated below:

H. R. 9285. An act to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death; to the Committee on Claims.

H. R. 367. An act to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes; and

H. R. 10954. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to execute agreements of indemnity to the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., and the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa.; to the Committee on Finance.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN OWENSBORO, KY., AND ROCKPORT, IND.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the extension of time for the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind., is before the Committee on Commerce.

The House of Representatives passed a bill in almost identical language, being the bill (H. R. 9280) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind., which bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

I move that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill with a view to its immediate consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 9280.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9280) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 2589 and that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended, which is open to further amendment. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there is in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian belonging to German nationals property that was sequestered during the World War to prevent it from becoming an asset of Germany. The value of that property totals $270,000,000. The Government during the war took over certain German vessels, certain German patents, and a radio station, the appraised value of which, together with interest at 5 per cent down to the present time, amounts to another $60,000,000 in round numbers. Thus it is evident that there is held German property, and in addition thereto there are credits due German nationals, amounting to a total of $330,000,000.

As a result of the World War a Mixed Claims Commission was appointed to pass upon the claims of American nationals against Germany. Awards have been handed down, and there are others in process, making a total of some $260,000,000. Of this amount $175,000,000 is principal and $85,000,000 interest. Germany has made provision, or rather we became a party to the Paris agreement and are to receive, as a consequence, an allowance of 2¼ per cent of the Dawes annuities for the payment of these awards, and the Government of the United States accepted this 2¼ per cent, which was held to be our fair share of the Dawes annuities.

The pending bill provides for the return, now and later, of this German property; that is, the bill apparently provides for its return. The bill also provides a fund from which all American claims are to be paid, if ever paid.

Of course, there is no other provision made for payment so far as Germany is concerned except the 2¼ per cent of the Dawes annuities; and that 2¼ per cent is limited in any year to $10,700,000. That being the case, how long and when can we expect that the 2¼ per cent will pay the awards made on account of American claims?

Mr. President, on April 5, 1926, before the House Committee on Ways and Means, Acting Secretary of the Treasury Winston made a statement which, in part, is as follows:

> * * * the United States on account of the mixed claims awards (to American citizens and the United States Government) were fixed at 2¼ per cent of all the receipts from Germany on account of the Dawes annuities available for distribution as reparations, provided that the annuities resulting from this percentage shall not in any year exceed 45,000,000 gold marks.

Or about $10,700,000. Mr. Winston continued:

> It is estimated that all the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, which Germany is obliged to pay, will aggregate $190,000,000 of principal and $60,000,000 of accrued interest to January 1, 1926, or a total of $250,000,000.

Up to September, 1928, the total will be about $260,000,000.

> If no interest is to be paid upon accumulated interest—

And that accumulated interest, I might add, is about $85,000,000—

> If no interest is paid upon accumulated interest, an annuity of $11,000,000—

He estimates $11,000,000, whereas the maximum amount is actually $10,700,000—> would pay current interest and pay the $60,000,000 of accumulated interest in 40 years, and thereafter in 40 years more would amortize the principal of the awards, a total of 80 years.

In other words, it was the view of the Treasury Department in 1926 that it would take 80 years for $11,000,000 to pay off $250,000,000 of awards, whereas we have, as a matter of fact, only $10,700,000 to pay off $260,000,000 of awards. But, Mr. President, the pending bill apparently provides for the payment of these awards within 39 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it not proposed to pay 80 per cent of the awards now?

Mr. HOWELL. It is proposed to pay 80 per cent of the awards within the next three years, all the accumulated interest on 80 per cent of the awards within the following three years thereafter, or a total of six years, and the remaining 20 per cent of awards and interest will be paid in full by the end of 24 years from September 1, 1928.

So, Mr. President, we have this remarkable achievement, whereas in the orderly way of payment the German annuity of $10,700,000 will require 80 years to pay the American awards, a plan has been devised, although Germany is not to pay another cent additional, to complete the payment of all awards within 39 years.

Mr. President, what financial wizardry is involved in this remarkable result? Why, the German nationals are not to receive the money to which they are entitled. Part of their funds are to be confiscated and used to pay these American awards. Second, the United States Government is to sacrifice tens of millions of dollars. The American taxpayer is to help pay these awards. That is what this bill provides.

For instance, among the assets of the German nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian is $25,000,000 in cash, unallocated interest. To consummate this remarkable result, this $25,000,000 is to be taken to pay American claims, and German nationals are not to begin to receive any part thereof until the end of 24 years, and then it is to be paid back to them during the next two and one-third years without interest.

What does this mean? Payment is to begin at the end of 24 years and is to be finished at the end of two and a third years later. So let us assume the average time 25 years; $25,000,000 payable 25 years hence is worth to-day only about $7,500,000. The difference between $7,500,000 and $25,000,000 is $17,500,000; so in connection with this item alone it is proposed to confiscate, and Congress is asked to approve the confiscation, of $17,500,000 for the benefit of American claimants.

Again, it is provided that in order to pay these American awards immediately we are to deduct $40,000,000 from the Alien Property Custodian fund and turn it into the fund created out of which these American awards are to be paid, the German owners to receive no interest upon this $40,000,000 during the first three years of the payment period. This is another confiscation in the way of interest, amounting to $6,000,000, and there is proposed a further confiscation of interest in connection with credits due German nationals on account of ships, patents, and radio station.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am not quite clear as to what the Senator means by his statement that there is a confiscation in regard to ships, radio station, and patents. The Senator recalls that an umpire is created for the purpose of determining the value of the ships and of the patents and of the radio station.

Mr. HOWELL. What I meant by that was, that of whatever is allowed on account of ships, patents, and the radio station ultimately, one-half is to be used to pay American awards, and only at the end of 24 years are the German owners to begin receiving the principal, and then only with simple interest thereon. There is an element of confiscation in this proposed transaction which I have not calculated definitely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will still pardon me, the Senator knows my views with respect to this matter if it were a proposition de novo; but, as I stated the other day, we are presented with an accomplished fact, with a situation quite unique. We are presented with a further set of circumstances growing out of the practical unanimity upon the part of the claimants, American nationals and German nationals, in regard to this plan.

May I ask the Senator what he would do if the responsibility devolved upon him of settling this matter? We have this property in our possession. The German nationals are demanding that they get as much of it as they possibly can at as early a date as possible. A dollar now may be worth a great deal more to them than a dollar and a half in two or three or four years from now. They are willing to make some concessions in order to release this property. American nationals have claims against Germany. They see that they may not be able to get payment of their claims except in 20, 30, 40, 50, or 80 years unless some concessions are made by them; so, by mutual concessions, this plan is presented. Shall we turn back the property to Germany, and say to the American nationals, "You get nothing unless we take the 2¼ per cent"? Obviously they could not be paid within 80 years. Shall we then declare war upon Germany, and say to Germany, "We are going to blockade your ports; we are going to fly in the face of the Dawes commission annuities, and we demand that you pay to the American nationals now that two or three hundred million dollars that has been awarded by the Mixed Claims Commission"?

What would the Senator do? It is a situation, as the Senator can see, that has many complications; and I have been compelled reluctantly to assent to this bill, with all of its incongruities and all of its objectionable features, because, first, the parties interested—more interested than the Senator and myself—say that this is the best settlement that can be made all around.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, my purpose in addressing the Senate to-day upon this subject is to suggest and prevail upon the Senate to adopt a modification of this plan, which to me seems but proper; and in order to make my argument as effective as possible it is necessary for me to go into the details of this measure and show the incongruities that exist therein, so that the Senate may judge as to whether my suggestions are rational, logical, and would be just, not only to American claimants but also to German nationals.

The distinguished Senator from Utah long ago took the position upon the floor of the Senate that German nationals should receive their property, that has been held for the last nine years by the Alien Property Custodian. He has taken such a position here upon the floor because he was aware of the past attitude of the United States respecting the inviolability of private property in time of war. He knew that for the last 140 years we have been foremost among the nations of the world in insisting that nations made war upon nations, not against individuals, and that private property should not be confiscated, even in time of war.

I recall an instance that illustrates this point—the impression made upon even the boyish mind of Admiral Farragut when he was a midshipman aged 14. He was on board the U. S. S. Ranger when the British warships Phoebe and Cherub attacked that vessel in the harbor of Valparaiso in violation of the laws of neutrality. He held his station beside his commander, Captain Porter, the father of Admiral Porter, of Civil War fame, during that action, as his aide de camp, and he performed his duty in a manner worthy of a man. Though but a lad, the captain sent him, pistol in hand, to drive back a gunner skulking from his post. Later, when this boy of 14 was taken as a prisoner on board the flagship of the British squadron, he discovered in the arms of a British midshipman his pet pig, "Murphy," and attempted to wrest it from its captor. The Briton insisted the pig was a prisoner of war also, but little Farragut held his ground, stoutly maintaining the pig was his property and that private property was not subject to confiscation, even in time of war. His argument evidently was not conclusive, as another battle took place right then, little Farragut whipping his antagonist and walking away with that pig. Even upon his immature mind, at 14 years of age, there had been impressed this American idea of the inviolability of private property; and yet, Mr. President, although for more than a century this Nation has stood before the world advocating this principle, for the last nine years we have held $245,000,000 or more of property belonging to German nationals, refusing to return it. Why? Have we changed our views respecting the inviolability of private property in time of war?

No, Mr. President. American nationals, with some $260,000,000 of awards at stake, have been able, through the organization of a claimants' association, to so influence Congress that Congress has failed to return this property until, as the distinguished Senator from Utah has stated, the German nationals have come to their senses, as American claimants say, and agreed that part of their property shall be confiscated in order that they may get a major portion thereof.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I apologize for intruding again, but before the Senator concludes I hope he will make some suggestion as to how we can meet the situation and pay both the American nationals and German nationals and pay the American Government out of the small 2¼ per cent of the reparations. Of course, if our Government had done its duty in the beginning, had taken part in the conferences of the allied nations, and demanded its share of the reparations at the outset, a different situation would have been presented. But their negligence has in part contributed to the dilemma in which the American claimants are placed, and, as I stated, this bill seems to have been worked out for the purpose of reconciling the differences and accepting a situation with all of its complications and its former mistakes.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, as I have already stated, this bill provides a fund out of which the American awards shall be paid, and I have merely begun to indicate how this fund is to be formed. It is true that German nationals have finally consented that if they can get 80 per cent of their property they are willing that 20 per cent shall go into this fund. They have also agreed that if they can get this 80 per cent they are willing that $25,000,000 of unallocated interest accruing from this property shall go into this fund also.

Then they have made another concession, and I want to call the Senator's attention, especially to this arrangement: We took over, as the result of an act of Congress, certain German vessels, and in the same act it was provided that when they were taken over the President of the United States should appoint a board to appraise them, determine their worth, and report the facts. We also took over certain German patents, which have also been evaluated. In addition we took over a radio station, which has been appraised at $460,000. The total of the appraisal of these vessels, the patents, and the radio station, together with interest, amounts now to about $60,000,000.

As a result of this entente between American claimants and interested German nationals the Germans have agreed that if they can get one-half of the value of the vessels, patents, and radio station now, they are willing that the other half shall be placed in this fund likewise.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. This bill, in paragraph (e), on page 49, provides that "The total amount to be awarded under this section shall not exceed $100,000,000, minus the sum of" so and so. These vessels were appraised, under the board to which reference has been made, at $34,000,000. They were all vessels that had been tampered with, attempted to be ruined; their machinery had been purposely injured. In Mr. Bernstorff's book he says:

> Consequently, on the morning of the 31st of January (1917), I had already given the order that the engines of all ships lying in American harbors were to be destroyed. I had already been given instructions to this effect at the time of the Sussex crisis, and these instructions had now been repeated from Berlin. As a matter of fact, it was dangerous to allow of any delay, for on the evening of January 31 our ships were already seized by the American police. As far as I know, however, all of them, without exception, were made unfit for use before this occurred.

Those were the ships that came into our hands, and they were appraised at $34,000,000. It is provided in this bill that the claims for the ships and the radio station and the patents shall be adjusted on a basis not to exceed $100,000,000. I understand that perhaps the patents and the radio station would be worth about $15,000,000, which would leave $85,000,000 for the ships. I propose to offer an amendment to this bill to strike out $100,000,000 and to make it $75,000,000. I do not think these ships ought to be valued at more than $50,000,000, at the outside, and that would include interest on the $34,000,000.

It seems to me the bill is too liberal, in these circumstances. These German ships were all damaged, all purposely injured, according to Mr. Bernstorff's own statement, and according to our own information, and now to give them $100,000,000, $15,000,000 for the radio station and patents and $85,000,000 for the ships, seems to me perfectly absurd.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska permit me, as a member of the committee, to reply briefly to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Florida that in my opinion, in view of the limitations placed in the bill in connection with ascertaining the value of the ships, taking into account the sabotage, taking into account the fact that immediately before there was no prospect of their being used, or being competent to be used, until the termination of the war, taking into account all of those factors, in my opinion no umpire will give an award to exceed $50,000,000 for those ships.

I feel sure that the shipowners would fare far better to accept the award made by the naval officers, plus the interest, than by referring the matter to an umpire. However, may I say that I think the United States made a mistake in not putting those ships through the prize courts at the time of their sequestration. I know the Senator from Montana and myself, on the Judiciary Committee, insisted that the ships should go through the prize courts, and I feel sure that if they had gone through the prize courts at that time the value, in view of the sabotage, would not have been more than twenty-five or thirty million dollars. So that, in my opinion, the shipowners are profiting more by this measure than they would have profited if the ships had gone through the prize courts, and if they had gone through the prize courts, then there could have been no question raised with respect to the legality of the procedure or any taint of confiscation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am inclined to think the Senator's position is correct about that. If the Senator thinks the arbiter will not allow more than $50,000,000 for them, why not say so in the bill? We give them a leeway of $100,000,000, and there may be apportioned out of that $85,000,000 or $90,000,000 for ships, the radio station, and the patents. But $100,000,000 seems to me a very extravagant allowance for the arbiter to make, and $50,000,000 ought to be the limit allowed for these ships. They were appraised at $34,000,000. They were purposely damaged, and it was supposed they were put entirely out of business, but we managed in some way to overcome those difficulties, and used them. But the German owners could not use the ships. They were tied up. They were out of commission, and they could not have been used at the time when freight rates were high and ships made money. These ships would have been entirely tied up at the docks, and could not have been used.

Not only that, but I have a statement here which I think is correct. It is as follows:

> In 1922 or 1923 certain bonds of the Hamburg-American Line and the North German Lloyd Line became due. If my memory is correct these bonds totaled about 50,000,000 German marks, and these two companies paid off these bonds in the depreciated currency of that day. When they sold these bonds they received the equivalent of approximately $12,500,000. When they redeemed the bonds they paid the holders the equivalent of approximately $10,000. The injustice of this is glaring, because these two companies charged either American or English money for all their services after 1920. If my memory is correct, immediately after redeeming these bonds, the property so released from mortgage was used to float a new bond issue in the United States, the proceeds of which were voted to build new ships.
> I think you will agree with me that in equity these two companies had no right to redeem bonds for less than 1 per cent of the value received, and then claim an exorbitant value on the ships which we seized.

I propose, when the proper time comes and it is in order, to offer an amendment to strike out $100,000,000, in line 10, page 49, of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof $75,000,000. It seems to me that would allow more than $50,000,000 for the ships, and then it would allow a margin up to $25,000,000 for the radio stations and patents.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida for calling my attention and the attention of the Senate to the provision in the pending bill providing for the revaluation of ships, patents, and the radio station. As I have previously stated, by virtue of an act of Congress the President appointed a board to appraise these ships. The board proceeded to do so and reported them worth about $34,000,000. There were also certain patents valued at $7,500,000 and the radio station at $460,000, altogether, with interest, totaling about $60,000,000. The claimants' association not only insisted that German nationals should consent to the taking of 20 per cent of their property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, not to exceed $40,000,000, to pay American awards, but also that $25,000,000 of unallocated interest. They did not stop there, however. They said, "You ship, patent, and radio station owners must also contribute 50 per cent of the $60,000,000 now due you, for our fund, and you must wait until a distant date for repayment." When the owners demurred they were told, "If you will consent to this, we will have another appraisement of the ships and fix the limit at not $60,000,000 but $100,000,000. If the new appraisement is finally secured and comes out as we expect, you will get $50,000,000 right away, which is only $10,000,000 less than your total claim now. Then we will get an additional $25,000,000 for the fund which we are providing for the payment of our claims. It will not come out of you eventually; it comes out of the American Treasury and the American taxpayers will pay it. You should agree to this. It is a good deal for you. You may get $100,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, and of course we, instead of getting $25,000,000 for the fund that is to immediately pay our awards, will get $50,000,000." They agreed.

If the German nationals could get the $60,000,000 for their ships, radio station, and patents right now, they would be satisfied. That is my opinion. This is not their plan. This is the American claimants' plan to further raid the United States Treasury and make the American taxpayer pay these American awards, because they are afraid Germany may not ultimately do so.

As I have previously stated, by an act of Congress the ships were appraised by a board appointed by the President of the United States, President Wilson. The board reported the ships worth $34,000,000. What has become of the ships? Let me give you some examples.

It will be recalled that the other day the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated that some of the ships had been sold for more money than we paid for them. That is true. It is well known that a very ordinary cargo vessel has recently cost in this country from $50 to $60 a ton. Such vessels as that were sold in the midst of the war, or during 1918, for in the neighborhood of $200 a ton. Several of these German vessels were sold at that price, not because they were worth it when they were taken over, when they were in our harbors and could not leave, not then, but subsequently, and because of this I will indicate now what has happened to some of those ships.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, will he permit a question?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have been listening to the Senator with great interest and with as much continuity as one is permitted to listen in the Senate. I am curious to know how, if the Senator were writing the bill now, he would find the funds from which the American claims would be paid. The Senator from Utah asked him that a while ago, and I was not able to hear all of the Senator's answer. I understand that he does not approve of the proceeding for appraisal of the ships and the putting of $50,000,000 into the fund against that item. I understand the Senator does not approve of our use of the unallocated interest fund and the use of $25,000,000 from that source. I understand he does not approve of the retention of 20 per cent of the property of the German nationals, although they have agreed to its retention. I understand he does not approve of the contribution we get from that source. Obviously, the 2¼ per cent is not going to be more than enough to pay off the American claims in the next 80 years or so. Where would the Senator get the money with which to pay the American claimants?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I shall not answer in detail the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania at this time. I will merely say that there are certain American awards which are on account of profits only, and these American awards I would not pay out of funds taken from German nationals or from the Treasury of the United States Government. But until I come to that matter in the order of my remarks, I shall desist from further answering the Senator's question and will proceed now with a further statement respecting the vessels in question, if the Senator will permit me to do so.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair.) Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WATERMAN. If the bill is passed and becomes a law and the German Government does not pay as we now anticipate, then those American claimants must necessarily be paid out of the Public Treasury of the United States, must they not?

Mr. HOWELL. Unless we ultimately confiscate the property of private German nationals.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But has not the German Government already confiscated it and pledged it to us in order to secure the American claims?

Mr. HOWELL. The German Government has taken such action, but it has been the attitude in the Senate, and I am sure it is the attitude of the average American citizen, that even if the Government of Germany would confiscate these properties, and thereby allow us to confiscate them, we are not willing to be a party to the transaction, if not because of morals, because of policy alone. We have our property scattered all over the world. We are to-day the great creditor Nation. It is our duty to our neighbor and to ourselves to uphold the principle of the inviolability of private property in time of war.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator think that it will help our nationals in the next war if we take an extra liberal attitude on this question at this time when we remember that Great Britain, France, and Italy have each absolutely confiscated every penny of German property that they could lay their hands on? Does not the Senator rather think that Europe at least will follow that policy against us in the next war regardless of what we do in this bill, and that the generous treatment that we are giving German nationals now—for we are treating them better than their own Government treats them—is in order that we may live up to our own conception of right and duty and not to lay by a store of gratitude for the future? I myself have not any faith that the American nationals in the next war will be treated in this way by enemy powers unless we win that war.

Mr. HOWELL. I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania will agree with me that there was, during the last century, a great change of sentiment throughout the world, resulting in practically a change in international law respecting the inviolability of private property in time of war.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But it all went into the discard when the war came.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes, Mr. President, I realize that it did, but it had prevailed; it had come to be regarded as a tenet of international law; and the United States of America was as much or more responsible than any other one nation probably in developing that view, and engrafting that principle upon the body of international law.

Mr. President, if we had not taken that position, if other nations had not conceded it from time to time, we would never have made any progress respecting the confiscation of private property and our opposition thereto, but we did, and great advances were made. Now, because some European nations forgot the principle during the last Great War, should we forget it now? Should we return to old practices? I believe we ought to stand where we have always stood. The matter of doing so involves only a few million dollars.

Why! Mr. President, on the floor here, much like good fellows, we have voted to cancel Italy's debt if she will pay us but 1.1 per cent per annum upon the face thereof—$2,150,000,000—for 62 years.

But to return, Mr. President, to the ships. These German ships were valued at $34,000,000. It is now proposed that the ships, the patents, and the radio stations be revalued, and we fix a limit of $100,000,000 as the top price we will pay.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That includes accumulated interest, as the Senator from Nebraska will remember.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes, as I have before stated, the value of these ships, patents, and the radio station, plus accumulated interest, amounts now to about $60,000,000. It is proposed we provide for a possible increase of $40,000,000. What does this mean? Let us consider some of these ships.

Here, Mr. President, was the Andalusia, one of the vessels turned over. It was appraised at $100,360. We expended thereon in capital charges $323,000, in round figures. We have sold that ship for $17,000. Under this bill we may be taxed $200,000 for a ship that we have sold for $16,000 after paying $322,000 in capital charges thereon.

Let us take, for instance, another ship—the Arcadia. That case is not quite so glaring. We paid $86,940 for that ship; we expended thereon $102,000, and we have sold it for $54,000.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Nebraska, as he gives these figures, tell us when we made the sales?

Mr. HOWELL. I have not the dates.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is it not obvious that the whole amount appraised for the vessels and the whole amount of the reconditioning them might well have been repaid to us in a single voyage during war time?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that a ship has a very long life if it is properly maintained. I might say, for the information of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, that the first ship on which I sailed as a midshipman—that was in 1882—had fought an engagement with and captured a French war vessel in 1799. Of course, what the Senator has stated respecting single voyages was possible during the war. However, I do not think that the suggestion is really a valid argument against the thought suggested by a comparison of these figures.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I meant it to be in answer only to a part of that thought. The reconditioning expense was incurred during war time at a period of very high prices, in a very great emergency, when there was necessity for very great speed. When the work had been done the vessels were put into war service. The appraisal, on the other hand, was made by five naval officers without hearing any evidence on the side of the shipowners during war time when they were not giving the Germans the benefit of the doubt by any means, and the average appraisal of those ships was only $34 per gross ton, whereas the cost of building such ships was upward of $60 per gross ton in German shipyards before war was declared.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there was a board of naval officers appointed by the President of the United States to appraise these vessels. In my opinion, that board, appointed as it was, made as fair and just appraisement at the time these ships were seized, as possible for any body of men. I will read in this connection from a letter which I recently received from the Secretary of the Navy:

By Public Resolution No. 2, Sixty-fifth Congress (S. J. Res. 42), approved May 12, 1917, a board of survey, known as the Board to Appraise Enemy Vessels, was appointed by the President, May 19, 1917, to carry out the purpose of the resolution.

This board proceeded at once with the physical examination and appraisal of each vessel and forwarded its findings to the Secretary of the Navy under date of June 10, 1918. The report was in the nature of a letter of transmittal accompanied by the statement of valuation in each case.

In general, the method followed by the board in each case was to ascertain from the available sources the first cost of each vessel and then, from carefully worked curves of depreciation, to ascertain her value per se at the time of the seizure, due account being made for damage to machinery.

That was the method followed, Mr. President, in the appraisement of these vessels, and remember the engines on practically every one had been destroyed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not think the Senator means quite that.

Mr. HOWELL. Not entirely destroyed, but they had been seriously damaged.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Vaterland, which is now the Leviathan, had not been injured in her power plant at all. Many of them were not injured.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not a fact that there has been expended on the reconditioning of the Vaterland over $6,000,000?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is a fact, and we made it necessary very largely by tearing the whole insides out of her to equip her for carrying troops.

Mr. HOWELL. But these were capital charges, Mr. President. If her insides were torn out and then replaced, that was not properly a capital charge. I am merely referring to capital charges.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is certainly a capital charge to recondition a ship for passenger service.

Mr. HOWELL. The item was for reconditioning the Vaterland. If a ship is transformed, its insides torn out as suggested and then replaced, that is repair work and chargeable to operation and maintenance; but if you make additions, improve the ship, then the expense is chargeable to capital. However, the charges to which I am referring were capital charges and not charges on account of maintenance.

Mr. President, here is another ship, the Arnoldus Vinnen. It was appraised at $23,500; we spent $83,703 in capital charges, and then sold it for $48,000.

Here is the case of the Armenia, appraised at $86,150; spent $114,000 on it and sold it for $22,500.

Again the Barbarrossa. Appraised at $463,000; we spent $68,000 on it and sold it for $34,500.

Here is the Bochum. Appraised at $781,000; we spent $143,000 on it and then sold it for $478,000.

Here is the Bulgaria. Appraised at $215,000; we spent in capital charges thereon $284,000 and sold it for less than $20,000.

Here is the case of the Clara Mennig. Appraised at $99,000, spent $119,000 thereon, and we sold that ship for more than it cost—$280,000.

Here is the Dalbek. Appraised at $32,000, we spent $45,000 on it, and sold it for $57,000.

Here is the Elmshorn. Appraised at $211,000, spent $149,000 on the ship, and then sold it for $64,000.

Here is the Grosser Kurfurst. Appraised at $606,000, we spent $533,000 thereon, and sold it for $100,000. Why, that ship had cost us over a million dollars, and we sold it for $100,000!

Here is the Grunewald. Appraised at $239,000 and sold it for $188,000.

Here is the Hamburg. Appraised at $449,000, spent $142,000 thereon, and then sold it for $65,000.

Here is the Harburg. Appraised at $106,000, spent $220,000, capital charges, and then sold it for $54,000,

Here is the Koln. Appraised at $284,000, spent $348,000 on it, and sold it for $19,000.

It is proposed to reappraise every one of these ships, and pay their owners possibly twice what they were appraised at, at the time they were taken over!

Here is the Magdeburg. Appraised at $112,000, spent $189,000 on it, and sold it for $43,000.

Mr. President, I will give you another case—the Pennsylvania. Appraised it at $409,000; spent $538,000 on it, and sold it for $8,000; and now it is proposed to go on and appraise these ships so as to give them as much more as they were appraised for at that time!

Here is the case of the Portonia. We appraised it at $89,000, spent $98,000 on it, and sold it for $9,000.

Here is the Princess Alice. Appraised at $507,000, we spent thereon $372,000, and sold it for $60,000.

The Princess Irene. Appraised at $503,000 and sold it for $100,000.

The Rhaetia. Appraised value was $254,000, we spent a quarter of a million dollars on it, and sold it for $15,000.

Here is the Sambia, appraised at $103,000. We spent $293,000 thereon, and sold it for $40,000.

I will not read this entire list, Mr. President, but to me it will be a remarkable fact if the American claimants' association, whose headquarters are in Chicago, can prevail upon Congress to provide for the reappraisement of these vessels—ships sold for little, relatively nothing, upon which tremendous sums were spent in the way of capital expenditures to the end that there might be $50,000,000, instead of $25,000,000 put in this fund for the payment of awards to American nationals.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what branch of the Government sold the vessels that the Senator has described?

Mr. HOWELL. The Shipping Board, as I understand. At least I obtained the information from the Shipping Board; and I assume that the Shipping Board handled these vessels, because there were certain vessels on my list for which they had no data.

Mr. JONES. They expended these amounts of money for repairs and capital expenditures?

Mr. HOWELL. No; these were capital expenditures. I am not talking about repairs at all, nor have any of the figures I have read included repairs.

Mr. JONES. These were capital expenditures, then, that the Senator has referred to?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Did the Shipping Board spend that money?

Mr. HOWELL. That is my understanding, because I obtained the information therefrom.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that the ships that were sold were sold all the way from three times the amount of the valuation down to almost a sacrifice price on account of the condition of the ships.

Mr. HOWELL. But whenever you find that a ship was sold for more, in every case, or nearly every case, you will find that the Government had spent tremendous amounts of money theron in the way of capital investment.

Mr. SMOOT. More than the appraised value of the ship and more than the capital expenditure on the ships.

Mr. HOWELL. But if they were sold for that it was during the war. We all know it is a fact that tramp steamers of the most ordinary specifications were bringing $200 a ton in 1918 that to-day can be bought in English markets for from $36 to $40 a ton.

Possibly it will be argued by the distinguished Senator from Utah that as the Germans became more active in 1918 and destroyed more ships, we should now pay more to German nationals for these ships because of the resulting increase in price. If that is the distinguished Senator's position——

Mr. SMOOT. No; I want to say to the Senator that my position is this: The bill does not take into consideration any increase in valuation after the year 1917, when the United States became involved in the war. I recognize that what the Senator says is true—that in 1918, until after the armistice of November 11, 1918, there was hardly any limit to the price that was put upon ships. They meant everything, not only to the conduct of the war but to the commerce of the world; and I know of ships selling for more per ton than the prices that have just been mentioned by the Senator. I know of ships that brought at that time over $325 a ton, and, as the Senator says, if those very ships were to be appraised to-day they would be appraised at about $60 or $70 a ton; and I will say to the Senator that those were the best ships, too.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in reply to a question by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], I stated that I would later address myself to the matter of a possible reformation of this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question before he enters upon that?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The figures that the Senator has given are interesting to me. I recall some of the low prices that were paid for the ships when we sold them, and without some explanation it would appear that the Government was wickedly wasteful in permitting almost an entire loss of some of these ships. I was under the impression that the ships on which we expended a good deal of money were ships that we needed during the war, when there was no limit as to what we would expend. Then, when the war was over, we had them, and had no use for them; and the question was, what to do with them, or how to get rid of them, and what would we take in exchange for them.

That was my impression. It appeared to me that there was a wasteful loss; but, on the other hand, is it a basis of criticism of the Government in disposing of them?

I am asking the question specifically for information.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, my purpose in reading this list of ships and their appraised value and their sale price was to point out that the Government did not necessarily make money out of these ships, as might have been inferred from remarks by the distinguished Senator from Utah the other day. I do not mean to say that he made any such positive statement, but he did imply in a general way that we had sold a number of these ships at high prices. I wished to make it clear that these ships were not a source of great revenue to the Government, and that we were, in this bill, confronted again with another recurrent proposition, quite common in recent years, as follows: That the Government of the United States should take its loss and not whimper, but when it comes to harvesting a profit that should be relinquished to the advantage of individuals. That is what I wanted to develop. Further, that we are here representing the taxpayers of the United States, and we should think of the taxpayers and their claims in the same terms we think of individuals making claims; and that the Government should not step aside on every occasion and say, "Take everything; the taxpayer needs nothing."

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator has given the explanation; that is, that we should take our losses and get out of it as best we can.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I have offered two amendments, which I will now submit. But as the two amendments are supplemental to each other, I will now present my reasons therefor.

There were two classes of awards made by the Mixed Claims Commission. One class of awards was made to American nationals, who were presumed to have suffered losses that meant misfortune. There was another class of losses quite different. Sixty-six per cent of these awards, and the interest thereon, are for American nationals who were presumed to have had actual losses involving misfortunes. Thirty-four per cent of these awards, together with interest, are for profits, pure and simple, enjoyed by insurance interests.

Insurance companies writing marine insurance collected during the war period of seven years two hundred and forty-seven millions in premiums. Their losses were 69 per cent, in round numbers. They had left 31 per cent for expenses, and they determined their own expenses, of course.

When they got through with the business, they reported a net loss of $60,000 on the $247,000,000 of business; that is, 45 insurance companies that wrote 90 per cent of the business.

During the same period of time the United States Government wrote marine insurance. The Government wrote it, not that it wanted to, because we are all opposed to the Government in business apparently, but they wrote it because the shipowners could not get insurance elsewhere. The Government wrote that business and administered it at an expense of less than one-tenth of 1 per cent, as against 31 per cent reported by these insurance companies. The result was that because of their saving in expenses they made about $17,000,000 on the premiums written.

When the ordinary insurance company writes a risk, and collects a premium adequate therefor, and has a loss, it takes the money out of its premiums, pays the loss, and that is the end of it. That is its business. A loss does not mean a misfortune. A loss is necessary to its business. It is in business to pay losses, for if there were no losses, insurance companies would not be doing business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to take just a few moments now to explain briefly the question of insurance.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to have a fuller attendance of Senators. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Edwards	King	Schall
Bayard	Ferris	La Follette	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	McKellar	Shipstead

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, practically the only argument made in favor of postponing the payment of the awards to insurance companies is that these companies made tremendous profits. As I shall show, no such tremendous profits were made and, furthermore, the companies were subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes.

However, in my opinion the question of profits has nothing to do with the matter. All other awards are paid wholly without regard to profits. Other American nationals undoubtedly made profits. Their prices reflected war hazards. For example, a vessel would pay for itself if it successfully completed two or three trips. And, yet, if sunk on the fourth trip the owner is entitled to payment of the amount of the value of vessel.

Again, the insurance companies writing war-risk insurance made a very substantial contribution to the public good. Were it not for the ability of American exporters to obtain insurance, the export business would not have been carried on. For example, in November, 1914, cotton was selling at 6.3 cents, a ridiculously low price, primarily because insurance was not available. After war-risk insurance was available the price of cotton rose markedly, until it reached 19.6 cents in December, 1916.

However, the following is a complete answer to the "tremendous profits" argument.

The following data were prepared and presented to the Committee on Ways and Means in November, 1926, by Alfred M. Best, who stated that he was a publisher of annual reports upon insurance companies of all classes, that he conducted an independent bureau, and was not connected with any insurance company. The figures cover 45 American insurance companies handling about 90 per cent of all marine business and include the years from 1914 to 1921. The figures are here given to the nearest $100,000.

Premiums collected	$248,400,000
Losses paid (less reinsurance and salvage)	169,100,000
Estimated losses not yet finally settled	2,600,000
Total losses	171,700,000
Expenses attributable to this business	76,700,000

The losses amounted to 69.12 per cent of the premiums collected and expenses to 30.89 per cent of the premiums, making a net loss on the business of 0.01 per cent of the premiums received.

The figures given cover all marine insurance business of these companies, including coastwise shipping. Prior to the war the profit of these companies ran in the neighborhood of 20 per cent of the premiums received.

The following figures show the marine insurance business written by the Government during the war period:

Premiums received	$47,000,000
Losses	30,000,000
Expenses	175,000
Profit a little less than	17,000,000

The Government's expenses for this business were extremely low. If I had time I could go into the details and show why the Government in conducting this business charged practically nothing because of expenses. Had the expenses of the Government amounted to the same percentage of premiums received as in the case of the private insurance companies the expenses would have been $14,000,000, and the Government would then show a profit of nearly $3,000,000 on the business.

Claims were presented by the marine insurance companies to the Mixed Claims Commission in the amount in each case of the actual loss paid on the policy to the insured. Any uninsured value of the vessel or cargo was not included, but a claim for such amount was presented by the owner or shipper. Thus if a cargo of the value of $10,000 which had been insured in the amount of $5,000 was lost the shipper claimed $5,000 and the insurance company $5,000.

Under the treaty provisions Germany was made liable only for loss suffered by American nationals. The question then arose whether the premium received by the company should not be deducted from the amount of the claims in each case. As a result of this and certain other technical objections raised by the German agent a rule was arrived at fixing the measure of recovery in these cases at 83 per cent of the amount paid by the company under the policy, less, of course, any salvage or reinsurance.

Now, I wish briefly, as I only have a minute or so left, to call particular attention to the fact that the essential difference between the awards made to the United States Government on account of losses paid by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and awards made to private insurance underwriters on account of losses paid under their policies is that under the treaty of Berlin the property belonging to German nationals in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian is held as security for the payment of awards to American nationals, but not for payment of awards to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

Mr. SMOOT. I will speak now for five minutes on the bill, and will discuss the question of the ships.

Mr. President, the provisions of the bill provide for a new determination of the value of the ships. The ships were appraised by a naval board of survey shortly after the ships were taken over by the United States. This board was appointed by the President pursuant to the provisions of the joint resolution of May 12, 1917, under the authority of which the title and the possession of the ships were taken by the United States.

The question has been raised as to why there should be a new appraisal. The committee gave very careful consideration to this question and decided upon the provisions of the bill providing for the new appraisal for the following reasons:

First. The provisions of the joint resolution itself did not contemplate a final and conclusive valuation by the naval board of survey. The resolution provided merely that the findings of the board should be competent evidence. We carry this rule into the bill. But this does not mean that the findings are conclusive.

Second. The rule of value adopted by the board did not seem to the committee to comply with the joint resolution. The testimony of Captain Roberts, of the Navy Department, who was a member of the board of survey, was to the effect that the board adopted a pre-1914 value of a tramp steamer as the basic measure of value to be applied. They then adopted a curve of depreciation, to be applied to these ships according to their age. The committee believes that the owners of the ships are entitled to the value of the ships at the time they were taken by the United Sates. That is, a 1917 value should first be determined, and then the necessary adjustments to that value, necessitated by reason of the actual physical conditions of these ships, and also by reason of the fact that they were not "free" ships—that is, the ships, immediately prior to the date the United States took them over, could not, as a practical matter, venture forth from our harbors. The naval board determined upon a valuation of approximately $34 a gross ton as the pre-1914 value of a tramp steamer. Many of the vessels, of course, were not of the tramp-steamer type. Many of them were of the fastest passenger and freighter class. It would seem obviously improper to apply this measure to vessels of these classes. The Mixed Claims Commission, in a large number of cases involving free ships, gave awards to American citizens. These awards show an average value of the ships involved of $304 per gross ton. It is by no means contended that this is the proper value, for this represents the value to American citizens of their ships during the high war prices, ships which could be sold or chartered without limitation for any voyage, and to earn rates under which the entire value of the ship would be returned upon one or two successful voyages. But it did seem to the committee that the arbiter should start out with a 1917 value of a free ship, and then make such deductions as are proper in order to reach the value of the ships involved at the time they were taken over.

Third. The proceedings of the naval board of survey were entirely ex parte. Neither the United States nor the owners were represented or had an opportunity to appear and present evidence as to what should be paid for the ships. Even though the awards of the arbiter should prove no greater than the valuation placed upon the ships by the naval board of survey, it seemed to your committee that fairness demands that the owners of the ships be given an opportunity to present whatever evidence they desire and attempt to prove the compensation which should be paid, and that likewise the United States should have an opportunity to appear and protect the interests of the United States.

Fourth. The rule of value prescribed by the bill will not permit of excessive valuations. It will be noted, on page 45, beginning with line 10, that a rule is prescribed for reaching the proper value, to the effect that it is the value to the owner of the vessel in its condition at the time of taking—that is, after whatever acts of sabotage there were had been committed—taking into consideration the fact that the vessel could not be sold or chartered by the owner until after the termination of the war, and in addition to that the fact that the war did not end until July 2, 1921. It is my opinion that the application of this rule will keep the aggregate values of the vessels within the $100,000,000 limitation, although it may probably permit of a value greater than that found by the naval board of survey.

Fifth. Although the amounts received by the United States upon the sale of the vessel is not particularly material, by reason of the fact that extensive additions had frequently been made, the fact that they were sold at high war price and the fact that the United States was perfectly free to sell them.

I may state that, generally, wherever the vessel was sold during or shortly after the war period it was sold at a price substantially greater than the naval board of appraisal plus the capitalized expenditures. Sales after this period, of course, were at a time when the price of vessels had fallen considerably, and in many cases the sales were made at less than the appraised value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the Senator from Utah may be extended.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask for further time.

Mr. HARRISON. I object to any extensions of time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am prepared to offer an amendment and the Senator can discuss that amendment, I take it. If the amendment is in order I move to strike out——

Mr. HARRISON. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. HOWELL. There is a pending amendment. The Senator from Florida will have an opportunity to offer his amendment later.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know that there was an amendment pending.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I think, it being after 2 o'clock, I still have five minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, let us keep clearly in mind what the situation is. This bill provides that, whereas there are $62,000,000 due the Treasury of the United States on account of awards by the Mixed Claims Commission, not one dollar will be paid into our Treasury on account thereof until the beginning of the 13-year period, which will commence 26⅓ years hence, and that then for 13 years we shall receive annually $10,700,000. What is the worth of that $10,700,000 for 13 years now? The $62,000,000 is due now. The present worth of that sum is but $7,832,175. Subtract that from $62,800,000 and we have a raid upon the National Treasury to the extent of $55,000,000 to pay these insurance claims. What insurance awards? Awards representing $52,000,000 of losses, together with the interest, sustained by 45 insurance companies who broke even on their insurance business during the war. Allowing them 31 per cent for expenses—and the expense of doing the business, so far as the Government was concerned, was less than one-tenth of 1 per cent, but they claim 31 per cent of the $247,000,000 of premiums written—their losses were 69 per cent, and just a little more in addition, about $60,000. In short, they practically broke even, according to their own testimony.

Mr. President, I have worked out the profit and loss of every one of these insurance companies, using 31 per cent of premiums as the cost of doing business during that period. Here is the Boston Insurance Co.: Upon marine-insurance business alone during the war that company made 52.7 per cent upon its stock. It has awards allowed to the amount of $2,194,000. If it receives that money the profits on its stock for the war period will be boosted to 84 per cent. Mr. President, it is proposed to take $55,000,000 away from the American taxpayer so that this and other companies may get an additional profit, although they have made, as I have stated in this case, on their capital stock 52 per cent; and when they get this additional profit they will have made for the war period 84 per cent. Can we defend such a raid on our Treasury in view of the facts?

Mr. President, what happened to this insurance company after the war? Instead of making money upon its marine business, including its inland marine business, it lost money for the next five and a half years. The war was a godsend to these insurance companies.

Again, take the case of the Federal Insurance Co. During the war it made 73.7 per cent profit on its capital stock from this line of business alone. Now, suppose we arrange to pay the Federal Insurance Co. its $2,379,000 in awards. How much will we add to its average profits for that period—33.9 per cent on its capital stock, making the total 107.6 per cent from marine business alone for the war period; and to do so, we will take it out of American taxpayers and German nationals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska talks about withholding these funds in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian in order to pay the debt due to America. I want to read again, for the Senator's edification, a part of the Porter-Knox resolution, reincorporated in the treaty of Berlin, which says that—

> All property of the Imperial German Government * * * and of all German nationals * * * shall be retained * * * until such time as the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government * * * shall have, respectively, made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said Governments, respectively, of all persons * * * who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America.

That is, of all persons who are citizens of the United States, not of the American Government; and the Senator talks about the claim of the American Government and the profit of these big marine insurance agencies. He forgets that the two items carried by the Government are for ships that were sunk upon which the Government carried its own insurance, and for insurance that the Government paid, one amounting to twenty-odd million dollars and the other amounting to some seventeen million dollars; and on the insurance feature the Senator forgets that our own War Risk Insurance Bureau made during the war in profits over $17,000,000.

Suppose, for instance, that the United States Government had appeared before the Mixed Claims Commission and had presented its claims instead of the insurance companies: The awards would have been made to them, and in those awards profits would have been included just the same; and yet the Senator would then have said, "The profits should not have been allowed."

I submit, Mr. President, that no one in this Chamber should be misled because these are insurance companies. Indeed, the fact that they are insurance companies and were writing policies during the war elicits my sympathy, because I can remember and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] will remember, back in 1914, that while cotton was away down and other agricultural products were away down, as soon as they could procure a means of insuring the cargoes, the prices for those products began to go up.

Of course they made profits. It was a hazardous business. They had to make profits in order to engage in that kind of business. They presented their claims to the Mixed Claims Commission. They were given a credit of the premiums that were paid, and in the instance of awards to the insurance companies they did not receive over 83 per cent of the amount of their claims. In many other cases the claimants were receiving 100 per cent of their claims.

Let me illustrate, if you please.

Suppose there was going across the water during those war days a cargo of $10,000,000, owned by the Standard Oil Co. or the International Harvester Co., as is the case here. Suppose $5,000,000 worth of that cargo was insured by one of these insurance companies and $5,000,000 worth was carried by the International Harvester Co. itself, or as the case might be, the Standard Oil Co. The ship was sunk. They go before the Mixed Claims Commission, both the insurance company that paid its insurance of $5,000,000 when the cargo was sunk and the other company.

The insurance company asks the Mixed Claims Commission to give them an award for the $5,000,000, less the premium that had been paid. They get their award for that amount. The International Harvester Co. or the Standard Oil Co. gets its award for its $5,000,000. If they had not had half of it insured, they would have received an award for the whole $10,000,000. There is no difference at all in the proposition; and I submit that it would be unfair to the insurance companies to single them out and say to them, "You must wait while the others shall be paid."

Why, in this list of awards here there are innumerable cases of the Swift Co., which lost cargoes. Part of the cargoes was insured, part was not insured. They got their part where it was not insured, and the insurance company is entitled to theirs where it was insured. The same thing is true of the Singer Sewing Machine Co., of the Remington Typewriter Co., of the International Harvester Co., of the Standard Oil Co., and innumerable other cases. They are all listed in the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

The Senator presented this matter to the Senate committee, and, with the exception of one member of the committee, they voted him down. We certainly gave the matter full consideration, and I submit that the action of the committee is fair and just.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to ask a question regarding the parliamentary situation. Are amendments in order now?

Mr. KING. No; not yet, until we vote on the pending one.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I will wait.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reference has been made during the debate to claims of American nationals against Germany, German municipalities, and German corporations growing out of the purchase of securities by American nationals which were issued by the German Government or German municipalities or German corporations. Some of these claims were presented to the Mixed Claims Commission and disallowed. Securities were issued by the German Government, German municipalities, and German corporations payable prior to, during, and subsequent to the war. Some of the securities issued by the Government had no date of maturity, the option resting with the Government to declare when they should become due.

Some of the securities were purchased by American citizens. The Mixed Claims Commission has made awards upon the claims of some citizens who hold securities. Under the rulings of the Mixed Claims Commission, however, many Americans have been denied relief. Most of the securities referred to were payable in marks and those that were issued after and matured since the war suffered by reason of the fall in the value of the mark. A different situation would have been presented if they had been payable in gold marks.

Certain of the securities maturing before and during the war were the basis of awards made by the Mixed Claims Commission, the mark being valuized at approximately 16 cents. I am told that securities including marks within the categories above referred to were sold in the United States for between $500,000,000 and $1,000,000,000 during and since the war, and that the greater part of these securities are valueless, thus entailing enormous losses to American purchasers.

No provisions were made in the Berlin treaty or the agreement creating the Mixed Claims Commission for the payment to American citizens for any damages or losses sustained by them growing out of these depreciated securities.

I have received hundreds of communications from American citizens calling attention to the losses which they have sustained and protesting against any settlement with Germany that does not afford them ample protection. A communication received but a day or two ago from a resident of New York shows that he purchased bonds issued by the city of Hamburg, guaranteed by the German Government, paying therefor approximately $2,500. He has received an offer from the representative of the municipality and the Government of $125 for securities costing him $2,500. He is not protected by the Berlin treaty, nor by the instrument creating the Mixed Claims Commission, and can obtain no relief from Congress, or at least can obtain no relief under the provisions of this bill.

It is unfortunate that American citizens can not obtain compensation for the losses sustained by reason of the lack of value of the German securities acquired by them. Of course, those who purchased marks payable in German currency, not in gold, did so at their peril, and are left in the same situation as German citizens found themselves in when they had acquired the currency of their own country. But there are other securities, purchased by American citizens, which, in my opinion, Germany should pay, and I hope that the day will come when fair compensation will be paid to American nationals growing out of the losses arising from the depreciation of these securities.

A word in regard to the matter referred to in the discussion. It has been said that the Berlin treaty contains no provision for the payment to the United States of losses sustained by it during the war. The Versailles treaty did provide that the United States should be compensated for its losses; but the American administration that negotiated the Berlin treaty failed and neglected to incorporate therein all of the provisions of the Versailles treaty which were for the benefit of our Government.

I have heard no reason offered for this neglect. And the State Department went further and declared that no reparations within certain categories would be claimed. I make no criticism of this last declaration by representatives of the State Department, although some have thought that the executive department assumed too much in waiving certain reparations and in making agreements that affect the rights of the United States and its citizens.

Because of the failure of the administration to fully protect the United States it has been relegated to the last priority in the bill; and if Germany should default in meeting the Dawes annuities, it may be that the United States will receive nothing. If the allied nations should refuse to pay over to the United States the 2¼ per cent provided for in the Dawes agreement, then not only the United States but American citizens would not receive the full amount of the awards in their behalf entered by the mixed claims tribunal. The failure of the executive department of the Government to push the claims of the United States and her citizens against Germany has been of great disadvantage, both to the Government and to its nationals. The Government has not received the costs of the American Army of Occupation, aggregating more than two hundred and fifty-five millions of dollars; and the bill before us has been placed at the foot of the list of American creditors, so that it will not be paid for many years the sixty-odd millions of dollars due it for loss of ships and property; and if Germany should default there would be uncertainty as to when, if at all, it would receive compensation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 87, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] proposes to strike out lines 16 to 25, and on page 88, lines 1 to 14, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], which I transfer to my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], but I am not quite sure whether the understanding I had with him contemplated a vote upon this matter. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote if he were present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina, and not being informed as to how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK].

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—21

Black	Frazier	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Blaine	Heflin	Norris	Waterman

So Mr. HOWELL'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to amend, on line 10, page 49, by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$75,000,000."

There has come to my attention since I made some observations on this subject this morning a discussion which took place in the House, particularly the remarks of Judge EWIN L. DAVIS, as appears on page 894 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 20 last, in which he gives many details regarding these ships.

It appears that most of these ships are very old, some of them 30 years old, some of them 40 years old. Very few of them were new ships, and they were all put out of commission by reason of the damage done their machinery, purposely done, and the sabotage was something enormous. I read from the RECORD:

> Now, the only other evidence on the value of these ships furnished to us by the committee is a statement made by the chairman of the committee that it was shown that the United States had sold 44 of these ships, as he said, for $14,000,000; and that is a mistake. This statement of the chairman was based solely on the fact that the attorney for these former German shipowners presented to the committee a statement of 44 ships which he claimed had been sold by the Shipping Board for $14,976,520.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator state from what page he is reading?

Mr. FLETCHER. From page 894 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 20:

> In January, 1920, the International Mercantile Marine Corporation submitted to the Shipping Board a bid of $27,400,000 for the cream of all of these German seized ships, including the Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, and all of the ships they thought were worth purchasing. They proposed to pay for the ships in 16 years' time and agreed to operate them under the American flag.

And the Shipping Board was in favor of making that sale.

It is further stated in these remarks:

> As a matter of fact, after the war the Shipping Board expended over $30,000,000 in reconditioning only a small number of these former German ships before they were fit for commercial usage. Practically all of such ships which were thus reconditioned and have since been sold were sold for much less than the cost of reconditioning them; in some cases the ships being sold for a small percentage of the cost of reconditioning.

For instance, there was the Los Angeles. They spent $2,000,000 reconditioning the Los Angeles, and sold her for $100,000. She was appraised by this board at $906,350.

I quite agree with the committee as to the basis of the valuation. I believe that is right. But I say again that the naval board appraised these ships at some $33,000,000 or $34,000,000, and under this bill the arbiter can allow up to $90,000,000 for them.

I think the radio station has already been settled for, and there is very little due for the patents. One or the other has already been paid for. Suppose $15,000,000 is included in this hundred million dollars to cover the patents and the radio station. That leaves $85,000,000 as a possible allowance for these ships. They are not worth that, and never were worth it.

I insist that $50,000,000 would be a liberal allowance for the ships. I think we ought to provide in this bill that not exceeding $75,000,000 shall be allowed for the ships, the radio station, and the patents. Therefore I am offering this amendment. I think it is a liberal leeway to allow the arbiter in finding what allowance shall be made for the ships. They were old ships, they were damaged ships, the machinery in most of them had been practically destroyed, and they were appraised by the naval board at $34,000,000. If we put $75,000,000 in this bill to cover the patents, the radio station, and the ships, we will provide for $60,000,000 as a limit of allowance for the ships.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have to leave the floor in just a moment, and I want to take this opportunity of asking a question of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I read from a letter by a constituent of mine, and I would like to have a statement of the chairman of the committee with reference to it. This correspondent says:

In view of our Government's intention to restore seized German property, it seems that we should insist upon the Government of Germany accounting in full for the evidences of indebtedness it sequestrated during the war period belonging to American citizens.

As the situation now stands, Germany is in the position of being able to escape payment of debts owing to American citizens covering securities, bonds, stocks, promissory notes, mortgages, and other negotiable instruments under that Government's control during the war, acquired by our people before the war, unless the Senate enacts remedial legislation to the alien property bill.

* * * * * * *

When Germany occupied Belgium and later other foreign countries, it started out to debase its currency and then shortly after the signing of the armistice issued tons of paper currency bearing a pre-war date, exchanging it for gold. This all occurred while American-owned evidences of indebtedness were in Germany, having been sequestrated by that Government. Now, after Germany had tied up our citizens' negotiable instruments so that they could not get rid of them until after the currency in which they were payable had become practically worthless, that Government claims that our people are not entitled to recover their loans on the basis of the rate of exchange existing at the time they were made, but, on the other hand, insist that German nationals should recover the value of their property which we took over according to its worth at the time it was seized by us. I submit that this is not justice.

I would like to have the chairman of the committee give such explanation as he may and state whether or not it is covered by the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that I have answered the same question two or three times on the floor of the Senate and it will only take a moment to answer it again.

If the mortgages of which he speaks matured before the end of the war, which was in 1921, then the Mixed Claims Commission will give an award; but if it were after that time the Government of the United States can not pay all the losses on marks. All of the marks were nothing but paper marks. It would be impossible for the Government to do such a thing. The Senator knows that the mark dropped down so it was not worth anything at all. If an American national invested in Germany he was unfortunate. If the German national invested in the United States he was fortunate, because we had dollars and they are still dollars and they are worth 100 cents apiece, whereas the German mark that was issued before the war was nothing but a piece of paper. It would be impossible for us to take those items into consideration.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in my opinion the amendment of the Senator from Florida should prevail. Under an act of Congress the President was directed to appoint a board to appraise the vessels taken over from German citizens. That board was appointed, appraisal was made, and the value fixed at about $34,000,000. As the Senator from Florida has stated, many of those ships were old and were sold subsequently for less than their appraised value after the expenditure of large sums of money thereon. As many Senators were not present when I presented certain relevant statistics I shall take the liberty of now repeating them.

I will state, first, the appraised value of each ship; second, the capital expenditure made thereon, not including repairs; and, last, the price at which the vessels were sold.

The Andalusia, appraised at $100,000, capital expended thereon $322,000, sold for $17,000.

The Armenia, appraised at $86,000, expended thereon $113,000, sold for $22,500.

The Barbarossa, appraised at $464,000, expended thereon $68,000, sold for $34,000.

The Bulgaria, appraised at $215,000, expended thereon $284,000, sold for $20,000.

The Elmshorn, appraised at $210,000, expended thereon $149,000, sold for $64,000.

The Grosser Kurfurst, appraised at $606,000, expended thereon $533,000, sold for $100,000.

The Hamburg, appraised at $449,000, expended thereon $142,000, sold for $65,000.

The Harburg, appraised at $106,000, expended thereon $220,000, sold for $54,000.

The Koln appraised at $184,000, expended thereon $348,000, sold for $19,000.

The Magdeburg, appraised at $112,000, expended thereon $189,000, sold for $43,000.

The Nassovia, appraised at $94,970, expended thereon $114,000, sold for $54,000.

The Pennsylvania, appraised $408,000, expended thereon $538,000, and sold for $8,000.

Mr. President, such is the record in connection with these ships, and now it is proposed, although they have been appraised, together with patents and a radio station, including interest, at about $60,000,000, that we are now to provide for reappraisement and raise the possible limit the Government may pay from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000. The amendment of the Senator from Florida should prevail.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope Senators have read the provisions of the bill in relation to ships. We do not propose to give $100,000,000 for the ships, the patents, and the radio station. Let me read the provision of the bill so that Senators will understand it:

Such compensation shall be the fair value, as nearly as may be determined, of such vessel to the owner immediately prior to the time exclusive possession was taken under the authority of such joint resolution, and in its condition at such time, taking into consideration the fact that such owner could not use or permit the use of such vessel, or charter or sell or otherwise dispose of such vessel for use or delivery, prior to the termination of the war, and that the war was not terminated until July 2, 1921, except that there shall be deducted from such value any consideration paid for such vessel by the United States. The findings of the board of survey appointed under the authority of such joint resolution shall be competent evidence in any proceeding before the arbiter to determine the amount of such compensation.

What the Committee on Finance and the House had in mind was to say that these things shall not exceed $100,000,000 at most. The awards are to be made on the ships that are left. I want to say in passing that the ships the Senator has referred to are ships that could not be used. We did almost anything during the war to get ships so we could transport to Europe the necessary foodstuffs for our Army and for the allied armies, and munitions of war. It did not make a particle of difference what it was, if it would float it was used.

Mr. FLETCHER. How much of this amount is supposed to include radio and patents?

Mr. SMOOT. The estimated value of the patents is $15,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has not some of that been paid?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; none at all. One radio station is all.

Mr. HARRISON. There are two now.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; under the amendment which we adopted there will be two. Nobody can say what that will amount to. I do not know. All the committee of the House did and all the Senate is asked to do now is to make provision, to lay down the strictest rule that language could be framed to state, in relation to the values that shall be put upon the ships. I have not any doubt in my mind that when the ships are taken into consideration, the value of them will be measured just as the amendment provides, and in no other way. There will have to be taken into consideration whether the boat was tied up and could not be used, what was its condition, what sabotage occurred. All those things have to be taken into consideration. If the $100,000,000 is too much and the findings are only $75,000,000, or if they shall be $60,000,000, or whatever they may be, we only provide for that amount to be paid, and that is all that can be paid under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am thrown into utter confusion by the speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. Within a couple weeks he was contending bitterly that the Shipping Board had sold ships at far below their worth. He said they were very much more valuable and that the Shipping Board was to be blamed for selling those valuable ships so cheaply.

Mr. FLETCHER. I stand by that statement.

Mr. COPELAND. Now he is demanding that the appraised value shall be materially reduced and that the ships are not worth as much as intimated by the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Senator is wrong. I am willing to stand by the appraised value, which is $34,000,000, but I do not want to give them a chance to make it $100,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. I wanted to be sure what the attitude of the Senator from Florida is, because he has quite confused me by his speech here to-day.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, in considering the amendment, I hope that the Senate will give some attention to the time schedule which was followed by the figures which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has recited. In the spring of 1917 the ships were seized, and the joint resolution was adopted which directed that a survey be made to fix their value. Those ships had no market at that time because they were incapable of use. The German owner could not use them and could not sell them to anyone who could use them. They were tied up at the dock. They were not to be appraised according to the very much enhanced value of free ships. The board of naval officers who made the appraisal, having no market value to guide them, took the market value in 1914 and from that deducted three years of depreciation, and from that total deducted the cost of repairing all the sabotage; and the amount of their appraisal was the product of that series of subtractions.

Senators will instantly see that the appraisal took no account of the increasing scarcity of ships due to three years of submarine warfare. Senators will also remember that the committee, working in a hurry in war time, was not only unable to hear any evidence from the German owner of the ship as to what it was worth, but was physically unable to examine a large number of ships which lay in distant harbors. There were a number of them in harbor at Honolulu, one very big one that I remember seeing there. There were a number of them in harbor at Manila. The committee was utterly unable to see those and did not try to do so. It set an arbitrary value per gross ton for cargo ships and an arbitrary value per gross ton for passenger ships, and it applied that value to the ships that it could not see. In substance, the only thing that was expressed by the naval experts was the cost of repairing damage that was done to the machinery.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator will recall that as to the few vessels which they did not see, they had naval officers who were competent to make appraisals, examine them, and report to the naval board; and the latter availed itself of the observations made plus other factors employed in determining the value of the ships.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But primarily what they looked for was the extent of sabotage to the engine, and in some cases, as in the case of the Leviathan, we were able to discover no evidence whatever that there had been any sabotage. The Leviathan's engines came to us undamaged. It would have made a difference of tens of thousands of troops had that ship been damaged in the way some of the smaller ones were.

The trouble with that appraisal is that the value per gross ton which was used as its basis took no account of the change in world conditions and in the shipping industry in the three years that preceded their seizure by the United States. Nevertheless, fixing a very low rate per gross ton, as low as $33 per ton in some cases, much less than the cost of reproduction in Germany in 1914, using that very low value, they still obtained an appraisal of $34,000,000.

Remember also, Mr. President, that on top of that has accumulated 11 years' interest. We allow 5 per cent in the bill, and 11 years' interest at 5 per cent is 55 per cent on the original estimate. That brings it up to about $53,000,000, even if the arbiter did not increase the appraisal one cent.

The German owners, it is true, put in excessive claims. They claim that these ships are worth about $230,000,000, but the Finance Committee thought that was grossly excessive. However, in all fairness, after hearing from the men who made that appraisal in 1917, the committee could not but say that they thought that the estimate ought to be revised impartially. Therefore I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has five minutes on the bill, if he desires.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, let me ask a question before the Senator from Pennsylvania takes his seat. I should like to ask what happened between the time the report was made last year with $50,000,000 as the maximum and the report of the committee this year with $100,000,000 as the maximum?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. What happened was further consideration of the matter, in which the distinguished Senator from Michigan participated.

Mr. COUZENS. No; I did not participate in the determination of the $50,000,000 valuation. That is the point I am trying to get at. What happened between the time when the committee reported the bill a year ago with a maximum of $50,000,000 and reported it this year with a maximum of $100,000,000?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is what I am answering. What happened was further consideration, further reflection, and a conviction that we were not doing justice to the owners, which was the thing we set about in the preparation of this bill, so far as it was possible to do. Last year we proceeded on the theory that we must do everything to favor the American claimants and must not extend any favors to the Germans, and that we should stand by the 1917 appraisal. I myself started in this year with that in mind, with the idea that we would rest on the appraisal of 1917, and would not increase it one penny, but I had to admit, after I had heard the evidence particularly of Captain Roberts, who participated in making the appraisal, that it would not be an honest thing to claim that that was a judicial finding of the value of those ships. It seemed to me that the only honest way to treat it was to open up the question and to let the arbiter hear evidence on both sides.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator in reply to his statement that I was on the committee that considered the recommendation of a maximum of $100,000,000, that I was not impressed as the Senator was, and I voted against the report in favor of the $100,000,000 maximum in the bill. So the Senator may not with good grace say that I participated in the action of the committee that fixed the $100,000,000 limit, because in no manner did I agree to that maximum, and I do not now agree to it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not remember that the Senator voted against it; otherwise I should not have referred to his participation in that facetious way.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was not in accord with the action of the committee in placing the maximum allowance at $100,000,000. In my opinion, the facts brought to the attention of Congress in connection with the German ships and their value would not warrant the fixing of a value upon the same in excess of the figures submitted by the special award board. When the resolution authorizing the seizure of the ships was under consideration I realized that the question of their value would have to be determined sooner or later, and that the prudent and wise course—indeed, the strictly legal course—called for a judicial determination of the value of the ships. That course was suggested by a few Senators, but was not followed by Congress. If we had put the ships through a prize court, the value would have been fixed by judicial determination and that would have been a finality, but our own negligence, if not stupidity, has led to this complicated situation.

Mr. President, I do not want it to appear in the RECORD that the Senate or any Member of the Senate conceded that these ships and the patents and radio stations were worth $100,000,000 or $85,000,000. I think that the values fixed by the naval board were fair; that its members took into account all pertinent factors. I desire the RECORD to show that in valuing the ships they considered all the factors that were relevant or material.

The board considered the fair market value not after the seizure but before the United States took possession of it. Of course, when the United States took the ships after the declaration of war they attached to them a value not theretofore possessed. While interned their value was greatly below their pre-war value or their value after the United States became the possessor of the same. The Finance Committee, I feel sure, understand that in determining the value it should be based not as of the moment of seizure but prior to that time, when the ships were interned, or at least in ports of refuge unable to depart or to be of any service to their owners. They were in an inert position or condition in the harbors of the United States unsalable, unusable, with no market, neither the owners nor the German Government daring to have them go out upon the high seas, realizing that if they did the vessels would be sunk by the ships of the Allies. The ships just before the United States seized them were locked in our harbors, without being in a position for use—and of an uncertain and limited value. The umpire, of course, will take these facts into account and not the fact that immediately after the seizure there was developed a factor of value not possessed by the ships prior to that time.

I repeat what I said this morning that, in my opinion, $34,000,000, the appraised value, was a fair and just appraisal of the ships, and that an award for that amount, with interest, is all that should be made. I shall vote for the $75,000,000 limitation, but with the understanding that in so voting I am not conceding that the ships were worth $75,000,000. Having committed the folly of not employing the prize courts to fix their value, I think we are in honor bound, even at this late date, to have a judicial determination of their value.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the appraisement made by our Government was after an ex parte proceeding. Heretofore, when the bill was before the committee during the last session, I was persuaded, indeed convinced, that the value fixed by the ex parte appraisement was approximately just, and assuredly just, when we contemplated allowing interest at 5 per cent on that valuation. Now, however, upon further hearing, it having been pointed out and insisted that the original owners, the claimants, were not permitted to be heard and were not heard, that the proceeding was ex parte and that they desired to be heard and were willing to submit the matter to arbitration or to an arbiter to be appointed by the President, I see no danger in the bill as framed. In other words, the valuation remains to be determined; that is to say, the ultimate conclusion remains to be reached by the arbiter, having regard and taking into consideration the various elements of the problem as they appear in the bill.

The question is, What is a fair valuation and are we willing to leave it to the evidence to be produced? I rose, however, for no other purpose than this: I do not want the action of the Senate to have any persuasive or evidenciary force with the tribunal set up to determine this question. I do not wish it to be understood that because I once thought that the original figure, plus interest, was sufficient, that I adhere to that position now or that it shall be taken into account at all; nor am I to be understood, nor should the committee or the Senate be understood, as thinking that the ultimate value should be up to the full $100,000,000. I am willing, however, to leave that matter for decision by the arbiter, as provided in the bill. Therefore I see no danger to our Government in the bill as reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not unlike some other members of the committee who last year in the drafting of this bill favored the provision of a maximum of $50,000,000 for the ships in question. Our action at that time, I am quite sure, was taken upon the testimony of Captain Roberts, a member of the naval board, whose testimony had more influence with us than did the testimony of any other person before the committee. Captain Roberts appeared this year and he said that the value was fixed at the time when the ships were interned, subject to some other considerations. The resolution which was passed by the Congress directed the naval board to fix the value at the time of the taking. The time of the taking was in 1917; the time that the ships were interned was in 1914. I think the whole committee was impressed with the idea that the value was inadequate according to the appraisal of the naval board; I am quite sure I was convinced that it was an inadequate award.

The $100,000,000 maximum includes patents; it includes a radio station; it includes the ships; but the bill leaves it to the judgment of the arbiter to say how much the award shall be within that limitation.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] a few moments ago in discussing this question pointed out that many of the ships that had been taken over had been sold by the Government at a price which was much less than the appraised value at the time they were taken over or than the value that was fixed by the naval board. He did not tell you that in every instance they were ships that had been sold by the Government in 1921 or 1922 or 1923, away after the war, when, as we all know, the value of ships had gone down, and an adequate price could not be obtained for them. He failed to cite to the Senate the forty-odd ships or more that had been sold during the war that brought much more than the naval board's award.

So I submit that the fair thing to do is to leave the matter to this arbiter. My hope is that he will be Judge Parker, who was our representative upon the Mixed Claims Commission, who is a man of great ability and fairness, and has studied this question as to ships and other questions. I hope he will be allowed to render his judgment upon each ship as to what is the fair amount, according to the conditions laid down in the bill. The Government then will not lose anything; we will be doing the fair thing by these people, and I sumbit that since the judgment of the House is a maximum of $100,000,000, we ought to have a meeting of minds with reference to that and eliminate that one provision. It might also be said that while all other American claimants and German claimants are to receive under this bill 80 per cent at first, the ship claimants are to receive at first only 50 per cent.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, inviting attention to the bill itself, this arbiter is to be appointed by the President, and in a sense is to be our arbiter?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I just want to add that the thought of the Senator from Mississippi seems to me to be conclusive that we may trust our own agent to be at least just to us. We do not want him to be unjust to anybody.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, upon what principle is the maximum that may be awarded under this section prescribed in the bill? Is not the true rule of law the value of the property taken? And, if that is the case, if we are willing to pay the true value of the property, why do we say "provided the aggregate amount shall not exceed $100,000,000"? Why do we not say "the actual value of the property," and leave the arbiter to find what is the value of the property?

The point about that is this: One board that made an investigation found the value to be $35,000,000. The Senator from Mississippi has said that that was probably less than the actual value, and I believe it is true. Now, we say that the maximum amount awarded shall not exceed $100,000,000. Probably that is excessive. Whether it is or not I do not know; but it would seem that if we are paying for this property and appointing an arbiter to say what it is worth, we ought to pay what he finds it to be worth. Suppose he finds it to be in excess of $100,000,000. We have then undertaken by law to confiscate the property to that extent.

I just want to understand the theory upon which we say here in one breath that we are not proposing to confiscate anything and in the other breath we say that we will pay for it provided our own arbiter does not find it to be worth more than a fixed amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have finished all that I have to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I have used my five minutes. Will the Senator let me ask him a question or make a statement?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the House provisions he will find that when the bill was before them they insisted upon a limitation, and that is why it was put in in the House. It was not for fear that it was going to be less, but they wanted a limitation, and I am informed that it would have been almost impossible to pass the provision in the House unless there had been a limitation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, we can fix any limitation we desire. We can say "$25,000,000," or we can say "$10,000,000," or we can say "$35,000,000." There would be a basis for that; but what is the basis for fixing the limitation at $100,000,000?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that the representative of the German claimants and the representatives of the American claimants tried to get some basis of settlement, and in that basis they all agreed that $100,000,000 might be the maximum of the ships. The ship-owning claimants, as I understood, agreed to it; everybody agreed to it; and that is why the maximum was fixed in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. The German valuation was over $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think I have the floor constructively, and if any part of my five minutes is still remaining, I will gladly yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator still has two minutes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator will yield to me a part of his five minutes I should like to suggest that one of the strongest reasons for putting in that limiting figure seemed to arise on account of the very extravagant claims made by the Germans who owned these ships; and as a practical matter it seemed unlikely that we could get the bill through conference unless such a limiting figure were placed in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why not make the limitation $75,000,000, for instance?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because that is not enough.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the Senator investigated the matter and reached the conclusion that the true value is $100,000,000?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President; but I have listened to a good deal of testimony on the subject; and where the Navy appraisement with interest comes to-day to $53,000,000, and where the patents are estimated in testimony submitted to us to be worth $15,000,000 more, it is perfectly obvious that if any account is to be taken of the condition of the shipping of the world in 1917 about $100,000,000 will have to be authorized.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The figures that the Senator has stated approximate only $69,000,000.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is quite true; but that does not take account of the conditions in world shipping between 1914 and 1917; and the time of the seizure was 1917, although the ships were not then free and are not entitled to get the market price of free ships at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last vote with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained by illness. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK].

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] are necessarily detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. FLETCHER'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 79, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "noninterest-bearing participating certificates" and insert in lieu thereof the words "participating certificates bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum" and a comma.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that this is the modified amendment the Senator showed me?

Mr. KING. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, if it has been modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 60, line 17, after the word "repay," insert the words "the principal of"; on page 61, line 2, strike out the word "and"; on page 61, after line 2, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(13) To pay the interest provided in subsection (e) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended (relating to the investment of the unallocated interest fund), on the amounts repaid under paragraph (11) of this subsection.

And on page 61, line 3, strike out "(13)" and insert "(14)"; on page 61, line 6, strike out "(12)" and insert "(13)."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 87, line 24, strike out the period and in lieu thereof insert a comma, and after the comma add the following:

Provided, however, That all Liberty bonds or other obligations of the United States owned by such person as part of his property seized by or delivered to the Alien Property Custodian, or their proceeds if they have since been sold or otherwise disposed of, together with all income from such bonds, obligations, or proceeds, shall be returned in full to such person, and shall not be included in the property to be valued by the Alien Property Custodian as above provided in this paragraph, and no part thereof shall be invested as provided in section 25.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is that any Liberty bonds or other obligations of the United States held by an enemy at the time his property was seized should be returned in full without deducting or investing 20 per cent thereof in certificates. This is probably the law without such amendment; but it is suggested in order to remove all doubt and at the same time preserve the honor and dignity of the United States with reference to its own bonds.

These bonds represent its solemn promise to pay them to the bearer, whoever he may be; and the failure to return them in full is something far more serious than confiscation. It means repudiation. While there is no doubt of the power of the Government to repudiate, the general objection to such a practice has led to the rule, I understand, that even a law of confiscation will not be deemed to apply to a government's own obligations, unless expressly so stated. Indeed, in the War of 1812, this Government sent money to Great Britain during the war to pay interest on its bonds then held by enemies.

In the case of Liberty bonds, the appeal to national honor and patriotism is even stronger. For those bonds were bought by citizens of Germany after we had entered the war. They thus aided the United States against their own sovereign.

The amendment is carefully worded so as to exclude Liberty bonds purchased by the custodian or Treasurer out of money seized from the enemy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment. We should not now take the position that because a German national held a bond, and it was seized, it should be treated differently from any other property seized by the Government of the United States. The bonds were seized just as all other property belonging to German nationals was seized, and I hope the Senate will not make any distinction between the bonds and other property of German nationals, as to which we are to pay back 80 per cent of the value. If these bonds had been seized by some other country, the owners would not have gotten anything, but we are going to repay every dollar of their value within three years.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, does not the Senator see any difference between other kinds of property and an obligation of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not if the property was seized under the conditions under which all other property was seized, and they were the owners, just the same as any other national was the owner of any kind of stocks or bonds they held in this country which we have taken.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I see a distinction.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to call up an amendment proposed by me to the Finance Committee amendment, which is on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Maryland proposes an amendment, on page 52, line 24, to strike out the words "without regard" and to insert the word "subject," and on line 1, page 53, to strike out "or" and insert the word "and."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this were for the employment of Government servants for a number of years, or if it was to be in operation for a number of years, it would be quite different, but the arbiter will have to build up hurriedly an organization of experts, and if he has to wait until they pass civil-service examinations it will upset everything. I have a great deal of sympathy with the Senator when it comes to regular employees, but those who will be under the arbiter will not be regular employees. I think it would be a great mistake if we should attempt to put the men we want to get under the civil service.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Civil Service Commission does not agree with the chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance. The commission thinks that these positions should all fall within the classified civil service, and be dealt with as other positions which fall within that service are.

I was a little surprised to hear the Senator from Utah say that he was substantially in sympathy with me, because since I have been a Member of the Senate I have never known any proposition of this kind to come up that did not incur—I do not like to use the word "enmity," for that word indicates a settled animosity—but that did not incur the opposition of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The only case in which I objected was in the case of the prohibition administrator, and I think the Senator will admit that the result of the examination did not prove to be what he anticipated.

Mr. BRUCE. I admit nothing of the sort.

Mr. SMOOT. I think every other Senator does.

Mr. BRUCE. We all knew that a large percentage of the members of the existing Prohibition Unit were poor material. In other words, many of the force were unfit for the posts they held, and that was the very reason why they were not covered in, and were subjected to examination. The members of that force—and I say this with respect, because there were many brave and honorable men among them—had, as a rule, been appointed at the instance of agencies utterly untrustworthy for ascertaining fitness for public office. All that was testified to by General Andrews, the head of the Prohibition Unit. Some of them were suggested by the Anti-Saloon League, which, in my judgment, is absolutely the most unreliable agency that could be resorted to for the selection of appointees for the prohibition field force. Others were recommended by other than Anti-Saloon League politicians. So the Senator will recollect that when the proposal to bring the field force of the Prohibition Unit within the classified service was made I opposed it, notwithstanding the fact that all my life long I had been most earnestly wedded to the Federal merit system of appointment. My judgment was verified by subsequent events. Of the whole number of members of the Prohibition Unit who were subjected to the simple, practical examination devised by the Civil Service Commission no less than 75 per cent failed.

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty-five per cent.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not surprised at the statement of any percentage. If the Senator had said 100 per cent, I would not have been surprised. Eighty-five per cent "flunked," to use the expressive language of the newspaper press. Then, to make things worse, even the applicants for positions in the prohibition field force who had never been members of that force in many instances, after standing the examination, proved unfit for appointment. Indeed, Prohibition Commissioner Doran has stated that a considerable number of them had criminal records, a condition which, so far as I know, has been absolutely unknown in the history of applicants for positions in the Federal classified service. In other words, a certain number of criminals applied for those positions because of the graft they hoped to get out of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not know there was a time limit. I am very sorry, because there was a good deal more that I could have said on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has five minutes on the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. It would take me an hour to complete what I was saying. These men were seeking those positions in the prohibition service for the graft, for the opportunities for illicit gain in one form or another, that they held out.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. So much for that. I will have to ask the Senator from Ohio to excuse me, because my time is so short.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will have his time. I have but five minutes. So far as some of these provisions calling for expert qualifications is concerned, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] knows that experts of every kind, expert lawyers, expert doctors, expert engineers, even expert biologists and chemists, are selected under the Federal civil-service system. Why, then, is not the system suitable enough in every respect for the selection under it of the public servants who would be employed by this arbiter, even of a technical nature? No substantial reason can be given against it, in my humble judgment, and that is the judgment of the Civil Service Commission. They think that these employees should all be embraced within the Federal classified service. The eligible lists are full of the names of men at this very moment who would be entirely competent to fill the positions.

I most sincerely trust that, just as the other day the Senate by an overwhelming majority decided to bring the subordinate positions under the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation under the civil-service system, the Senate will to-day decide to bring the appointees of the arbiter called for by the pending bill under that system, too. There is no good reason, I respectfully submit, that can be argued to the contrary unless we propose, whenever we have a chance, by nibbling encroachments of one sort or another, to destroy essentially the value of the Federal civil service laws.

I hope there will be a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. The other day, when I made the suggestion that all employees of the Shipping Board be brought under the civil service law, apparently there was a lot of angry opposition. I heard mutterings on every side of me; but when the matter came to a vote there were just two votes in opposition to the proposition, and they were scarcely audible. It is one thing to make an appeal to buncombe and another thing to put one's self on record against the Federal merit system of appointment. That fact has been illustrated in the history of this body and of the House over and over again in recent years.

Now, if I have any time left, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the Senator a question. I did not want to divert him from his thought at all. I wanted to ask, this being a temporary matter and one which will not last very long, whether it would not be better not to place the employees under the civil service, for the reason that when placed under the civil service then we have added them to the list and immediately upon the approach of a discontinuance of this line of work they will ask to be transferred to other departments of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. FESS. Very well; I will take five minutes on the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask how long it is expected the work of administering this law will continue?

Mr. FESS. It is rather indefinite.

Mr. SMOOT. It will probably not exceed 18 months and could not possibly be longer than 2 years.

Mr. FESS. I had assumed that it would be longer than that. Nevertheless, it is temporary, and it would seem to be inadvisable to place these people in the classified service, because when we come to discontinue their positions, then we have all of these people making application to be transferred from this department into some other Government department. I think it would be quite unwise, notwithstanding I agree with the Senator from Maryland generally on the application of the civil-service theory.

Mr. BRUCE. I am sure the Senator has had called to his attention again and again cases in which temporary positions have been filled from the civil-service lists. Only within the last week or so such cases have been brought to my attention.

Mr. FESS. But not under a bill like this, where we have a great number of positions to fill. It occurred to me that those of us who believe in the civil-service reform should not seriously urge that temporary employees be placed in such positions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator how many persons it will be necessary to employ to administer the act?

Mr. FESS. I am not informed as to the number. I notice that the corridors of the House Office Building and the Senate Office Building are filled with employees conducting some sort of a campaign for clerical work of this nature.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I answer the Senator? We can not possibly have more than 20 or 25.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Could we not take them from the established eligible list?

Mr. SMOOT. We ought to be at work long before such a list would be established.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know, but how long does it usually take to establish an eligible list?

Mr. SMOOT. Several months elapse after the papers are in before they are marked.

Mr. FESS. How long would it take to disestablish it if it were once established?

Mr. SMOOT. It never would be.

Mr. BRUCE. But we have a list already. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] was complaining the other day because Virginia's quota was entirely filled and because Maryland's quota was entirely filled and because those facts were given as reasons why no more appointments should be made from Virginia and Maryland at the present time. There is no lack at all of available clerks and the like whose names could be handed down by the Civil Service Commission to the arbiter mentioned in the pending bill, if it would take too long to hold special civil-service examinations.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber and I would like to inquire what all this debate is about. Has some one proposed to keep these vessels in "dry" dock, against which the Senator from Maryland is protesting so vigorously? [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BRUCE. I consider that downright mean! [Laughter in which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] joined.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

Provided further, And notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act contained, that until all other awards by the Mixed Claims Commission shall have been paid, no payment shall be made on account of any such awards in behalf of any insurance company or insured, either in its or his own right, or assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that during the period of the recent Great War, the sum of its or his losses, in respect to his or its war risk, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in the case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this amendment is couched in the identical terms of the act which governed the distribution of the Alabama awards. The language is almost the same. It directs that the insurance awards shall be treated as similar claims were treated at that time except that after all other awards are paid then the insurance companies will receive the 2¼ per cent annuity until theirs are paid also. In the case of the Alabama claims there was no such provision for ultimate payment. No insurance companies or underwriters are to receive anything unless their losses exceeded their premiums during the war.

Mr. President, the United States Government has received awards amounting to $62,000,000. Of that amount, $26,400,000 was because of losses of vessels and losses sustained by the Railroad Administration of the Government. In the pending bill every other award is given a preference over the Government's awards. The awards of the insurance companies, which are largely profit, have immediate preference, but not a dollar of the awards to the Government for actual losses—that is, other than insurance losses—is to be received by the Treasury until after the lapse of 26⅔ years, and then they are to be paid over a period of 13 years. Under such circumstances the present worth of these awards of $26,400,000 is but $3,525,000. They were for actual losses by the taxpayers of the country.

Are we to defer the rights of American taxpayers and give preference to profits of insurance companies? Are we to give immediate preference to $52,000,000 of insurance companies' profits and defer the beginning of payment of the actual losses of American taxpayers for 26 years? In other words, are we to make the deference such that the present value of the $26,400,000 of awards to our taxpayers for actual losses will be but $3,525,000, when the bill is passed? Ought we to treat our taxpayers in this manner? Let us be fair. Let us adopt the same principle in reference to the distribution of these annuities that was adopted by the Congress in connection with the Alabama claims. We would then be acting in accord with our traditions. Merely doing justice to our taxpayers by thus advancing the time of payment of Government awards.

Mr. President, the amendment certainly should be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make an observation, though it is not quite germane to the amendment. On page 43, paragraph (h), of the bill this provision appears:

(h) Nothing in this section shall be construed as the assumption of a liability by the United States for the payment of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, nor shall any payment under this section be construed as the satisfaction, in whole or in part, of any of such awards, or as extinguishing or diminishing the liability of Germany for the satisfaction in full of such awards, but shall be considered only as an advance by the United States until all the payments from Germany in satisfaction of the awards have been received.

A casual examination of the section might lead to the conclusion that it did not sufficiently emphasize the fact that even if the awards made by the Mixed Claims Commission were paid in the manner and extent provided in the bill, Germany would not be exonerated from all other liabilities and obligations arising in behalf of the United States or her nationals either under the Versailles treaty or the Berlin treaty. I believe that a careful examination of this section and the proper interpretation of the same will lead to the conclusion that the bill before us deals only with the obligations upon the part of Germany to the United States and its nationals as those rights are set forth and determined by the Mixed Claims Commission.

It does not cover all of the obligations and liabilities of Germany as defined in the Versailles treaty. If Germany complies with all of the provisions of this bill she will not be exonerated from her obligations to the United States and her nationals growing out of the Versailles treaty and the Berlin treaty or the terms of the armistice. This bill deals only with the Mixed Claims Commission awards and the return of property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian to certain German nationals. I repeat when I say it is not intended by this bill to extinguish Germany's liabilities and obligations to the United States or to her nationals or to free her from the discharge of her duties and liabilities under the treaties referred to.

If the awards herein made should not be paid, if the allied Governments should fail to pay to the United States the 2¼ per cent of the Dawes annuities which under the Paris agreement the allied nations promised to the United States, or if there should be default in any particular in meeting the provisions set forth in the pending measure, Germany would still be liable and under obligation to discharge the terms of the Versailles treaty and the Berlin treaty in so far as those promises related to the United States and its nationals.

This bill does not deal with the obligations of Germany with respect to the cost of the army of occupation. She is liable, notwitnstanding the provisions of this bill and even though its terms are fuily complied with. I want it to be made clear that the understanding of the Senate is that this bill deals with a specific matter and not all of the matters in which Germany and the United States are concerned. It is not a comprehensive bill in the sense that it covers all questions arising out of the war and relating to the two countries. Germany has obligations to the United States and to her nationals not provided for in the measure before us, and if no part of the Dawes annuities should come to the United States, Germany would not be relieved of her liabilities to the United States and to American citizens to whom awards have been made by the Mixed Claims Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to my colleague that if he will read the report and also the hearings which were had in the House of Representatives, as well as the speeches made there on this subject, he will find that the bill provides for just what he has made clear he desires it to provide. I do not think there will be any question about the proposed legislation in that respect.

Mr. KING. I believe that is correct. I desire, however, to emphasize the point that Germany must understand that if there is any default in the payment of these awards, she is not freed because of the provisions of this bill from her obligations, nor is she to be discharged from further liabilities to the United States and her citizens as those rights are set forth and determined in the Versailles and Berlin treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEFLIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the committee amendment it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the funds hereby appropriated or authorized to be released or expended shall be paid to any person, or the associate of any person who at any time within five years last past shall have been employed in any bureau, commission, department, or branch or office of any executive, judicial, or legislative branch of the United States Government, or a member of a national Democratic or Republican committee; and any person thus disqualified to receive such money, who shall accept same, directly or indirectly, in violation of this clause shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof be fined not to exceed $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year in a common jail, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be proposed to the committee amendment, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make the necessary corrections in numbers of sections and subsections and in the lettering of paragraphs in the bill and references thereto. A number of amendments have been adopted, which may make necessary changes in numbers and letters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany, Austria, and Hungary, and of nationals of Germany, Austria, and Hungary against the United States, and for the ultimate return of all property held by the Alien Property Custodian."

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 46, referring to the disposition of property which is owned by the Government at Muscle Shoals, Ala.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if this joint resolution shall be made the unfinished business, will the Senator from Nebraska permit it to be laid over to-night so that we may consider a conference report and then have an executive session?

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to have the joint resolution laid aside for the consideration of conference reports or on to-morrow for the consideration of appropriation bill. Several Senators have spoken to me in anticipation of the fact that I would make the motion which I have made, and I wish to assure them and to assure the Senate that there will be no attempt to take snap judgment or to rush this measure. I shall want every Senator to have a fair opportunity to be heard, and, if my motion prevails, I expect to lay the measure aside for the consideration of conference reports and appropriation bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 46.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. I also ask leave to have printed in the RECORD with it a letter from Mr. W. C. Deming, president of the United States Civil Service Commission; a letter from M. C. B. Robbins, Acting Secretary of War; and two affidavits signed by Mr. J. R. Cochran.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 155) is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Members of the Senate of the United States that no person should be appointed acting postmaster or regular postmaster unless he be a resident of the county and State in which the appointment is to be made.

Resolved further, That it is the sense of the Senate that the law and regulations requiring that a person shall be a citizen of the locality and a patron of the post office for not less than two years, and shall have received his mail at said place and shall be of the age of 30 years are proper regulations and should be adhered to in the appointment of acting postmasters as well as regular postmasters.

Resolved further, That it is the sense of the Senate that any appointment heretofore made or made hereafter in violation of the above-quoted law and regulations does not meet with the approval of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the resolution to be referred to a committee?

Mr. BLEASE. I merely ask that it be printed in the RECORD, along with the documents I have mentioned, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

The letters and affidavits are as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Your letter to each of the three civil service commissioners with respect to the forthcoming examination at Anderson, S. C., has been received.

The closing date for the examination at Anderson is February 7, 1928. This is a first-class post office, paying a salary of $3,400 per annum. No applications have as yet been filed with the Civil Service Commission.

Applicants for this position are required to be 30 years of age, except that all age limits are waived for ex-service men who served in the World War or Spanish-American War and were honorably discharged. Applicants must have actually resided within the delivery of the office for two years next preceding the date of examination.

Your letter will be filed with the application division and the question concerning Mr. Cochran will be carefully scrutinized if he files an application.

Very truly yours,

W. C. DEMING, President.

South Carolina: Anderson, $3,400; December 27, 1927.

No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday or who has not actually resided within the delivery of such office for two years next preceding the date of examination shall be given the examination herein provided for. The Postmaster General shall determine before sending a name to the President that the candidate so selected has continued to reside within the delivery of the post office since the examination and up to the time of such selection.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 13, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Reference is made to your letter of January 20 in regard to J. R. Cochran.

Records of the North Georgia Agricultural College show John Robert Cochran to have been a member of the R. O. T. C. and S. A. T. C. at that institution from September, 1917, to June, 1919; that he completed 490 hours' work for military credit to June 9, 1919, and completed 2 years of military training, attended the R. O. T. C. Camp at Camp Lee, Va., June 21 to August 2, 1919, and successfully completed the camp course.

In spite of this, there is no record in the War Department that he was ever inducted into the service. War Department records do show a John Robert Cochran, 2d, who registered with local board, division 1, Anderson, S. C., on September 9, 1918. He gave his age as 43 and stated he had a son in Savannah, Ga., 16 years of age. In view of the similarity in names it is believed that the man concerning whom you wrote is the son referred to. If this be true, his age would have prevented his induction, the minimum for which is 18.

I am sorry that I am unable to give you more definite information.

Sincerely yours,

C. B. ROBBINS,
Acting Secretary of War.

ALLEGED MEXICAN PROPAGANDA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain letters indorsing my speeches on the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican scandal.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NIAGARA FIRE INSURANCE CO.,
Florence, Ala., January 25, 1928.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been reading with interest your fight in the Senate in regard to the prospective nominee in the next Democratic convention. I think you hit the keynote when you said that you did not favor our Government furnishing its Army and Navy to fight the religious battles for the Roman Catholic Church in foreign fields.

I am glad we have a man to represent us in the Senate who will fearlessly stand for the enforcement of our prohibition law, as shown by your recent action. It has always been my pleasure to cast my ballot for you. I expect to continue to do so.

Yours very truly,

H. F. KOONCE,

PINE BLUFF, ARK., January 30, 1928.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I take this method of indorsing your stand and your courage in the United States Senate on the two questions that are the most destructive and most deadly to our form of government and to our free American institutions—the liquor traffic and Catholicism.

When I say this I believe that I voice the sentiment of a large majority of the citizenship of the State of Arkansas.

* * * * * * *

I have also followed your career, in the House and in the Senate, through the press and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for many years with interest and satisfaction and regret that there are not more men in the Senate with the courage of your conviction.

If it should be possible for you to come to Pine Bluff in the near future or later in the year during the summer months, I am sure that the citizenship of Pine Bluff and Jefferson County and all Arkansas will join me in that invitation to come to Pine Bluff, in the county of Jefferson, which joins the county of Lonoke, the native county of our Senator JOE T. ROBINSON, and speak to us on a subject of your own choosing.

If you could do this any time it may suit your arrangements and convenience, and will so advise me, I will take on myself to take the matter up with officials and with religious, fraternal, and civic organizations to make the proper arrangements here. We will be delighted to have you come, and you will be at liberty and perfectly safe in "hitting them" as hard as you may.

I am,
Respectfully,

A. D. CHAVIS.

2730 DERBY STREET, BERKELEY, CALIF.,
January 24, 1928.

Senator HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: The Roman Catholic newspapers may distort their reports of what you are saying, for us in the West, but we know how to make allowances and to read between the lines. This is just to tell you so and to tell you that there are thousands here who are rejoicing at your courageous carrying out of your mission—the enlightening of the American people as to the greatest evil our country has ever known.

God will give you the strength of spirit and the peace that passeth understanding, which is born of love—for you love His law and His people. "There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. For He shall give His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." (Ninety-first Psalm.)

Respectfully,

Miss ANNIE H. ALLEN.

BOULDER, COLO., January 22, 1928.

Senator HEFLIN,
United States Senate Chamber.

DEAR SIR: The reports of both your recent speech and course have not only interested me but have pleased me far beyond language to express. Reporters may represent you as in a small minority, however, they know only too well that such is not, by any means, the case. For not only are the great hosts of Protestant Democrats, but hosts of Protestant Republicans as well are with you in the fight. Stand to your colors. Those of us who have taken the trouble to inform ourselves are thoroughly convinced that Romanism is the greatest curse in the modern world. Mexico is a fair sample in flower and fruitage. The United States is the most coveted prize of the Roman hierarchy to-day. It seems entirely impossible for any man to be a true Romanist and a loyal American citizen at one and the same time. For four years I have made a careful study of Romanism from every angle. The Dark Ages were the fruits and shadow of Romanism.

I am exceedingly anxious to take the field and speak on Protestantism versus Romanism and the Pope's candidate for the Presidency, from now until the convention meets in Houston. But whether or not I could get enough along the way to enable me to do it, I don't know of course, but was never more anxious to do anything. I am a North Carolinian and a Democrat, a Baptist by religious affiliation. So far as I am able to tell practically all the Protestants of all this section of the United States are opposed to Al Smith, for two outstanding reasons and would hardly support him under any circumstances. The Protestants of the entire country are exceedingly fortunate in having you in the Senate at this time. The local action taken by two or three small groups in your own State are due evidently to entirely local conditions and doubtless local prejudices. Don't be disturbed in the least by them. Yield not an inch, it is the hour of opportunity, the more discussions in the newspapers the better. The people need arousing from their long lethargy. You are the representative of true Americanism, civil, and religious liberty, Protestantism and Democracy.

Respectfully.

CHAS. H. UTLEY.

80 MYRTLE AVENUE,
Stamford, Conn., January 26, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you for the great, unflinching, manly courage which you have at all times displayed as a Senator, but especially that which you have shown in the last few day's in spite of the many threats and ridicule which I know you have received from the enemies of all Protestant Americans, the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Roman-controlled scurrilous press.

Brother, I feel that you are fighting this great fight for liberty for all of us, and may the protesting Protestants of America uphold your arms as did Aaron and Hur hold the hands of Moses in the wilderness. This, remember, Mr. HEFLIN, that one shall chase a thousand and two shall put ten thousand to flight.

My prayer is that God of our fathers shall strengthen you in this great hour of need and send forth more manly men like you who is willing at all times to tell the truth. "The lip of truth shall be established forever, but a lying tongue is but for a moment." I am,

Yours truly for Protestant America,

GARDNIER T. ROBINSON.

THE FRANKLIN FIRE INSURACE CO., OF PHILADELPHIA,
Claymont, Del., January 24, 1928.

Hon. SENATOR HEFLIN,
Alabama Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I congratulate you on your stand in reference to Gov. Al Smith, of New York.

As an old Virginia Democrat I again congratulate you.

Very truly yours,

DANIEL KNIGHT, Jr.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., January 25, 1928.

Senator THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
Senator from Alabama, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read very carefully your reported speeches in connection with the political machine which is at work in the United States with the avowed purpose of breaking down the American principles that are inculcated in the Constitution of these United States. Thank God that we have a man of your caliber who is strong and brave enough to come out into the open and say what he believes to be true. It is high time that the American people awaken from their sleep to the danger that is threatening this land of freedom.

I was born and reared in Alabama. Permit me to say to you that I believe that you are one of the outstanding big men of the country, and that I, as a native of Alabama, am proud of the record that you are making in the Senate.

With kind personal regards, believe me,

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM C. GUTHRIE,
Ex-Judge Juvenile Court of Duval County, Fla.
(Being judge of said court for eight consecutive years.)

COMER HIGH SCHOOL,
Comer, Ga., January 20, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: This is to assure you that I thoroughly indorse your position in regard to the Robinson-Smith affair. I am sure that the Democratic Party is not ready to elect any wet candidate, Catholic or otherwise. We need more men of your type and conviction in the Senate.

Yours very truly,

O. G. LANCASTER.

LEWISTON BUSINESS COLLEGE (INC.),
Lewiston, Idaho, January 26, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: Congratulations upon the splendid work you are doing in Congress for this Nation. I do wish that we had some more Senators like you. Will you kindly place our name on the mailing list so that we may receive copies of your speeches in order that we pass them along to several hundred people?

Keep up the good work for you are admired and appreciated by every loyal American.

Yours cordially,

FRED L. ULEN, President.

CHICAGO, ILL., January 27, 1928.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I wish to commend you for the wonderful stand you are taking in the Senate for those truly American principles.

Do not worry or do not despair, because there are millions of good, red-blooded Americans, who are working and praying for you.

The real Americans realize what you are doing for them and I can assure you that we can truthfully say, thank God for HEFLIN. May God bless you and guide you, Senator.

I am.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE D. ARNOLD,
4736 North Kilpatrick Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

SHELBYVILLE, IND., January 18, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator from Alabama.

DEAR SIR: I desire to voice the sentiments of several thousand people in Rush and Shelby Counties of Indiana, and commend you upon the stand you took and the sentiments you uttered, in your tilt with Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas, in regard to the political machine of papistry.

May the same dauntless courage, which has led you so fearlessly in the past in your defense of American ideals, be your guide for the future. Remember always that thousand upon thousand of true American citizens are watching and depending upon you to hold the country to American ideals and hold the enemy in check.

May God keep and bless you and your efforts.

Very sincerely.

S. T. KNEISLY,
Reclamation Officer for the Klan.

WATERLOO, IOWA, January 18, 1928.

Senator HEFLIN.

DEAR SIR: Keep the good work up. We are standing right behind you, and last year, where our papers barely made mention of your speech, we had a whole column to-day.

Remember the Hippodrome? I'll say we do.

Y. I. T. S. U. B.,

Dr. and Mrs. M. A. TAYLOR,
1003 Mulberry, Waterloo, Iowa.

UNION PACIFIC SYSTEM,
Kansas City, Kans., January 24, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to extend my congratulations to you for your courageous speech yesterday. I heartily indorse all of it.

A poll of the employees here show seven to one for you.

As the local newspapers carry very little American news, I wonder if you would be so kind as to have a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with your speech of January 23, sent to me.

I am, your sincere admirer,

R. L. CONNER,
1943 North Valley Street.

CLINTON, KY., January 21, 1928.

Senator TOM HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Wish to heartily approve and commend your attitude on the Al Smith and Roman Catholicism proposition. If your Democratic colleagues think this country will support Al Smith for the Presidency of the United States, they are pitiably ignorant of the situation.

Of course, the rum crowd, the Catholics, and the criminals will criticize and condemn you, but the great, sober, right-thinking element of this Nation will approve and indorse your courageous arraignment of this thinly veiled effort on the part of certain politicians to nullify the eighteenth amendment and deify the Pope of Rome and incidentally lead the Democratic Party to suicide and oblivion.

With sincerest appreciation of your attitude and the noble fight you are making for civic righteousness, religious freedom, and the perpetuity of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

J. KELLY SMITH.

125 SOUTH HENNESSEY STREET,
New Orleans, La., January 18, 1928.

The Hon. J. THOS. HEFLIN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I have just read with much glee the account in this morning's Times-Picayune about the latest fracas in the Senate. May I take this opportunity of expressing to you my admiration for your unbounded physical and moral courage exhibited in combatting at every turn the increasing encroachments of Roman Catholicism. It will be a sad day for this country when the breed of men like yourself is stamped out. Personally, with very slender means, I am trying to help the class of conservative, constructive Protestants that built this country—of which my ancestors were a part—retain it, and I am most grateful that men like yourself are putting their shoulders to the wheel.

Very respectfully, SYLVIA F. METCALF.

KINGFIELD, ME., January 24, 1928.

Senator HEFLIN.

DEAR SIR: The people of Maine stand back of you in your magnificent fight for Protestant Americanism.

Sincerely yours,

(Rev.) JUDSON P. MARVIN.

SOMERVILLE, MASS., January 23, 1928.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SENATOR: Whereas United States Senator THOMAS HEFLIN, of Alabama, has shown such splendid courage in his fight for our institutions and the maintenance of peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this meeting of the Good Will Club, of Somerville, Mass., comprising 1,800 men and women, in meeting assembled extend him our earnest support and sincere appreciation in this patriotic stand; therefore be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator HEFLIN, a copy sent to the Fellowship Forum, and one be spread upon the records of this meeting.

Yours respectfully,

THE GOOD WILL CLUB,
Somerville, Mass.

DETROIT, MICH., January 19, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: I wish to commend and thank you for the stand you took on the floor of the Senate yesterday.

* * * * * * *

And may you be successful in defeating the nomination of Al Smith, as it would be a calamity to the Democratic Party.

We are interested in our representatives, and thank God you have had the nerve to make this stand.

Yours very truly,

J. L. RISK.

SOUTH ST. PAUL, MINN., January 20, 1928.

Senator THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Just a word of encouragement from a northerner, or rather a northwesterner.

I admire your courage, and it is indeed queer that in this land of ours any conversation or treatment of Roman Catholic matters should be such a taboo. This foreign organization is discussed openly in England, Germany, and other European countries frankly, but any reference to it here is met with the cry of "intolerance."

This cry from one of the most intolerant systems ever organized, the Roman Catholic Church, which organization by its bold methods commands the fear of even some of our Protestant-affiliated politicians.

You are fighting a winning battle for the open recognition of what the Roman Catholic Church is, i. e., an intolerant, scheming, political organization of Jesuitical and international mind. It can not have a national mind until it leaves the leadership of its foreign ruler who even now seeks temporal power once more from the Italian Government.

You have the support of millions in the North and West * * *.

Assuring you of my admiration and being confident of your success, I am,

Yours very truly,

H. A. HOLMGREN,
129 Fifth Avenue North, South St. Paul, Minn.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH,
Iuka, Miss., January 26, 1928.

HON. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just finished the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 18 and write to praise, commend, yes bless you, for the noble rôle that you played recently on the floor of the United States Senate.

Continue this noble work, remembering that you are doing God's work in a mighty dark hour. Let nothing deter you from this crusade of righteousness. Stand forth as God's annointed and rebuke this dangerous dragon of Romanism, which has destroyed so many fair civilizations and reduced others to impotency.

The writer is a disabled chaplain of the World War, a 100 per cent American, whose ancestors came to this country in 1805.

I pray daily that our party will not nominate Al Smith, but if our leaders do that suicidal act they must not expect the common people to vote for him, for we will not do it. I am close to the heart of the man in the street, and I say to you that there will be a revolt among Mississippi Democrats if our party gives them that wringing wet Tammany Romanist from New York.

It would be better for us to go down in honor with a clean, true American than to go into the White House with such a hybrid American as Al Smith.

I feel this impulse; the next time you come up for election I would like to steal across the Alabama line and cast a vote for you, but being a Methodist minister, I am, of course, above those tactics which have been carried out by Tammany for years in New York City.

Remember this, thousands of true Americans do not retire at night without carrying your name to the throne of Divine Grace.

Go forward with God and remember that "no weapon formed against thee shall prosper."

May God bless you, give strength to your good right arm, and make you invincible in this holy war.

Your friend and brother in Christ,

G. C. SCHWARTZ.

P. S.—My good wife and my little girl, Virginia, send their love and assure you of their prayers.

HELENA, MONT., January 20, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Reading your fearless speech delivered on the floor of the Senate, I write to let you know you have thousands—yes, ten thousands of followers, silent though we remain, waiting for election day to register our good old-fashioned Americanism.

Not wishing you or your party any bad luck, I am hoping Al Smith gets the nomination; the Catholic Church's political machine might just as well find out how they stand now as 100 years from now.

We have paid propagandists right here in the State of Montana plainly out in the interests of Al Smith.

Only yesterday a stranger came into my office trying to draw out my opinion of Al Smith and the Catholic Church. I gave him no opinion.

This fellow was about 25 years of age, and claimed to be from Georgia. I say again, Senator, "Stay with it."

Yours very truly,

FRANK H. COY,
36 North Park Avenue.

DAILY DROVERS TELEGRAM,
Kansas City, Mo., January 24, 1928.

Senator J. T. HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Just want to assure you that the hard blows you are administering to whisky and the Pope are causing no little comment in this far-off section of the country. And these comments are of the most complimentary kind, from Democrats as well as others. Everybody, outside of Catholics, commend you for your bravery in facing such a gang.

Rest assured, therefore, that they are taking notice, and when it comes to a show-down you will find you have a much larger following than you anticipated, believe me. I am

Yours,

A. L. PIZER.

CENTRAL CITY NONPAREIL,
Central City, Nebr., January 21, 1928.

Senator THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Here is a sincere expression of the admiration felt by a small-town editor for the first man within his knowledge with "intestinal stamina" sufficient to throw down the gage of battle to the Roman hierarchy, publicly and fearlessly, in the United States Senate Chamber.

While you have extreme difficulty in getting your side of every incident before the citizenry as a whole, never lose heart. You are gaining ground. The cause is advancing. The great army of "tolerant-at-any-price" Protestants is undergoing a change. Many are beginning to wonder why honest, God-fearing, fair-minded Americans can not raise their voices in criticism of the Church of Rome without incurring the instant wrath of every Catholic of their circle of acquaintance. Many, too, are asking themselves why Catholics generally get so wrought up over these affairs if there is nothing to keep from the searching glare of common discussion and knowledge.

There is a day coming, God grant, when men who have the welfare of the American Nation truly at heart will be recognized for their real worth. It will be a day when men prize principle more highly than they now do tainted dollars; a day when Sinclairs and Dohenys will be as abhorrent to society as are Hickmans and Hotellings to-day. This is indeed a beautiful picture, a distant ideal, but it can be realized if enough men can be found who, like yourself, are not afraid but eager to expose political ulcers—whether aggravated with religious intrigue or not—when and where they find them.

Keep up the good work; there are countless men and women who are figuratively patting you on the back, even though comparatively few take the trouble to send a concrete word of encouragement.

Sincerely,

EDWIN M. BURR.

RIDGEFIELD PARK, N. J., January 25, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator from Alabama, Senate Chamber,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I desire to commend you on your public attitude with respect to the political machine known as the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and sincerely trust you will continue to "carry on" along the same lines you have been doing, as to the best of my knowledge and belief, your attitude is meeting with much public approval.

It is to be hoped that you will become a candidate for the Democratic nomination against Smith of New York, as I earnestly believe, were you to enter the convention as a candidate, you could muster a sufficient number of delegates to prevent the nomination of Smith, which of itself, would be a great public service, and, in fact, from what I can hear and read in the newspapers, it is possible that you might be able to secure the nomination.

You may rest assured that your efforts are being appreciated by the great body of real American citizens in this country.

Yours respectfully,

W. R. PADEN.

NEW YORK, September 21, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: We of New York who see Smith and his Catholic cohorts at close range and their continual attempt to undermine the religious liberty of our fair land, thank you from the bottom of our hearts for your fearless work in the Senate.

Yours truly,

GROVER C. MILES.

WILMINGTON, N. C., January 20, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read the press reports of your courageous and masterful speech in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday last, prompted by the unjust, malicious, and slanderous attack made on yourself and three other honorable Senators by the yellow effusions of the Hearst combine. Also, have received this morning my copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, carrying only a portion of your speech, balance to appear in the Appendix Saturday, 21st instant, and am now writing to assure you, as I had the pleasure of doing during the last Congress when you were the lone defender of American interests against the insidious and underhanded attempt to involve our country in war with Mexico, that I most heartily agree with you in the position you have taken and what you said.

Please do not get discouraged in your wonderful fight for America against the most heartless, subtle, and unscrupulous enemy of our liberties that ever pressed their unholy feet upon the soil of God's footstool.

The people are with you, Senator, in this neck of the woods and are not inadvertant to the fact that the noise made by the opposition is only for the purpose of sustaining their courage sufficiently so that they can look into the face of oncoming events whose foreboding shadows spell only disaster for all those who, by their words and conduct, give aid and comfort to the enemy.

Strength to your arm, Senator, and may the God of battles sustain, protect, and preserve you in your efforts in this high and holy hour in our Nation's history.

I am, with great respect,
Your friend,

J. A. MCNORTON.

NORTHWOOD, N. DAK., January 21, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to extend you my congratulations for the fight that you have made on the floor of the United States Senate against the political activities of the Roman Catholic Church. Everyone who has watched the newspapers and knows what is going on in their own local communities, their own State, and the Nation as a whole knows that this is the greatest propaganda machine that was ever built up in this country.

I admire you for the courage of standing for your convictions when there are so many in Washington who know what is going on and who are afraid to speak because "they are afraid of the cars."

Very truly yours,

HORACE G. WEBSTER.

DAYTON, OHIO, January 24, 1928.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,

HONORABLE SIR: I have been following up your fight for American principles with great interest. You have done your country a great service in bringing these vital matters to the attention of its citizens.

Red-blooded Americans are with you heart and soul. Only our country's foes and a bunch of weak-kneed politicians and yellow-sheet publishers are fighting you. Knowing what I do of the tactics of your enemies, I fear for the safety of your life. Be on your guard.

I am a Republican, but I am an American first and wish we had more Senators like you in both parties. Keep up the good fight. Millions of American citizens are praying for you.

Very respectfully yours,

W. HENRY GRAHAM.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.,

DEAR SENATOR: Allow me to praise you from the depth of my heart for your firm and courageous stand taken in defense of our country against the nefarious Roman influence. There is no use of our trying to dodge the issue, nor to lull ourselves into a false security. We may not know all that is taking place, but enough straws are being blown by the wind to inform the observant that all will not go well with religious liberty in this country unless the guardians of it remain ever vigilant, active, and true.

So remember, we are for you old boy; just keep after 'em and let 'em know that we are not asleep, nor are we being fooled by their sly work.

With highest regards for your integrity, fidelity, and probity, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely yours,

Senator JAMES THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Please permit me to thank you in the name of truth for your fearless utterance in the United States Senate. You are rendering a distinctive service to this Nation and to all the world, as great as any since the days of Luther and Lincoln.

If the time should ever come, which God forbid, when anyone anywhere dare not tell the truth about anything affecting the life of America, the Republic is doomed, and that agency which can bring that to pass has in pledge our blood-bought heritage, and we are no longer trustees in fact of liberty and justice, but a Nation of cowardly slaves.

May the Lord Jesus Christ Himself bless you as He blessed the Apostle Paul, and may He give you perfect holiness, perfect health, perfect wisdom, perfect safety, and perfect success.

Yours truly,

ZED H. COPP.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please accept my congratulations on the magnificent fight you are making in the Senate against the powers of evil that would debauch and ruin our glorious country. In my opinion it is far better for the Democrats to never elect a President than to make a compromise with the wets, the Catholics, and the Al Smiths; and I am glad there is one man in the Senate with the backbone to call a spade nothing but a spade. May the Lord give you health and strength to keep up the fight until the victory for right living and right thinking is won. I feel sure that all the better element of the people, especially in the South, are behind you in this fight. I get full and complete information on the doings of Congress and the party leaders by reading the Atlanta Journal. The majority of the other papers that circulate in this vicinity publish only garbled reports of such things as the recent events in the Senate and suppress that which is not favorable to the wets, Catholics, and Al Smiths.

Yours very truly,

FRANK D. MILLER.

Senator HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We take this opportunity to congratulate you upon your complete exoneration from any taint of character brought against you by the Hearst publications in connection with the mythical Mexican slush fund, and to assure you that we have kept in touch with your activities in behalf of Protestant America and international peace. We heartily commend your courage in carrying on this fight against the enemies of our Nation, and believe that you will go down in history as an honored pioneer in this movement against a world-wide international effort to Romanize America.

With best wishes we are,

Faithfully yours,

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am living in Memphis, Tenn., but I travel Alabama and Mississippi constantly. Of course the Catholic-bought papers are against your course, but the people of Alabama and the entire South are with you. They will find that in your next election in Alabama you will sweep the State as you have never done.

* * * * * * *

You are making the greatest fight for Americanism of any man in America to-day. Keep up the fight. The people are with you, and you will win out.

Wishing you the very best success.

Your true friend,

Senator HEFLIN (Democrat), from the State of Alabama,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been reading a great deal about you in the newspapers, and as a native Texan wish to congratulate you on the position you have taken. I believe it would be an outrage for the Democratic Party to nominate Al Smith, from New York, as a Democratic nominee for President. I am against him in every way. Thousands upon top of thousands of Democrats would vote the Republican ticket to defeat Al Smith for President. Thousands of Democrats would not vote at all. No Roman Catholic should be allowed to sit in the President's chair. He may be ever so good a man, but we know he owes allegiance to the Pope above all others, and there is no argument to put up against this.

Just as sure as the sun rises and sets, we are bound to have a Republican President again if Al Smith is nominated by the Democratic Party. Nothing would please the Republican Party more than to see Al Smith nominated by the Democratic Party, because they know thousands would vote the Republican ticket in order to defeat Al Smith.

You are to be congratulated on the position you have taken. You certainly are a nervy man. The State of Alabama should be indeed proud of you, and I again congratulate you upon the stand you have taken.

Yours very truly,

W. N. JOHNSON.

DEAR SENATOR: I have just read with much pleasure your speech which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 20. It is a wonderful argument and unanswerable. Would it be possible to have, without cost to you, a copy of your speech sent to each of our members? Kindly let me hear from you and keep the good work up. You are rendering the country a real service.

WASHINGTON CAMP NO. 31, VIRGINIA,
PATRIOTIC ORDER SONS OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Richmond, Va., January 25, 1928.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator State of Alabama, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Washington Camp No. 31, Patriotic Order Sons of America, located in the city of Richmond, Va., with a membership of 200, commends and congratulates you on your stand against Al Smith and Romanism.

We concede to every man the inalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, but no man has a right to be President of this country unless his allegiance is first to this country.

God forbid that this dear old country of ours should ever be ruled by a man whose allegiance is first to a foreign potentate, whose very acts are contrary to the laws and the Constitution of our country, and who is opposed to public schools and free speech.

We want America for Americans, and we urge you to "carry on," and may God shield and protect you and give you strength to continue the "battle of right" for a purer, nobler, and more genuine America, which our forefathers fought and died for, and we wish to assure you that we ever stand ready to follow in their historic footsteps.

By order of the camp in session, Tuesday, January 24, 1928. I am

Yours very truly,

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,

MY DEAR MR. HEFLIN: Permit me to say I admire your courage in the stand you have taken in the Senate against the Roman Catholic political machine. Have wondered why more of our Protestant officials in Washington do not do likewise. Certainly it must be evident to thoughtful people that Catholitic political power in America has come to be a real menace. Any well-informed man knows that wherever a Catholic has power he fills positions with Catholics. It is true in factories, big stores, and in city administration, and Governor Smith deliberately tells an untruth when he says otherwise. I have been employed in factories and big stores and I know.

Yours truly,

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: I am sorry that I am not rich and powerful, so that I could be of some very real assistance to you in connection with your stand against Catholicism.

At least, I can write you this letter to say, "God bless you" and "God keep you."

I am just wondering if you are aware that some years ago the Pope issued a general call upon all Catholics, in all stations of life, from the humblest to the highest, to so conduct themselves that they would win promotion and become subchiefs, and chiefs, and chieftains, etc. * * * and then, having won places of authority * * * see to it that Catholics are promoted and retained in service at the expense of other religious denominations * * * and in this way advance the power of the Catholic Church in a bloodless revolution.

I understand that the Bureau of Printing and Engraving is a good example of the fruits of this plan; the Government Printing Office is said to be a better example; and the Veterans' Bureau seems to have more than its share of Catholics in authoritative positions. I am sure that civil-service figures would show a very high percentage of Catholics holding key positions, and I do not think this situation is in the best interests of humanity at large or of the Government.

I am writing to Mr. John Quinn, a Seventh Day Adventist, of Takoma Park, Md., asking him for a copy of the Seventh Day Adventist pamphlet which gives a copy of the above-mentioned Pope's order, and immediately upon receipt I shall forward it to you, for if you don't know about it I think you are the one man in America who should know about it.

Yours sincerely,

In last night's paper I read a United Press article headed "Senator HEFLIN scores Hearst for publication of Mexican 'documents.'"

Congratulations! I am very glad to see that you are going on with this fight. We certainly do not want war with Mexico whatever the Roman Church may want.

You are also fighting a greater battle than that. I believe that the very foundations of our Government are threatened.

I am very glad to have your former speeches and should like to have all that you make. You wish to let the public know facts instead of reading the fiction of our newspapers. It is just what is needed to awaken them to their political responsibility. The speeches which I now have and any that you might care to send me will be kept in circulation as long as I can find a reader.

MY DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I want the pleasure of saying that I have written a letter to one real American. You are one of our greatest Americans of to-day. Any man who has the intestines to get up in our United States Senate and speak the truth about the Pope from the shoulder as you have done, is a real American and will go down in history as one of the greatest of the great.

No doubt, when you were a boy, you have tossed a stone in a pond and watched the ripples follow each other until they covered the pond. That is your example in the Senate, and the ripples from those speeches have covered the whole United States. Yes, the world! And other ripples will follow. * * *

Stick to your fight. There are millions of Americans praising, and admiring you for your glorious stand on "Americanism." I have lived in Mexico and I know those ignorant peons have been robbed, up and down by the Pope.

May God let Calles and Obregon live until they have freed their country of the Pope's yoke. My father was raised a Catholic, and they were going to make a "holy" father out of him, so he ran away. He died a member of the Methodist Church.

May God give you strength and let you live long to wage the fight for this cause, and the fight for "Americanism."

WORK ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS—RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the Finance Committee. I hold in my hand this morning's New York Times, which contains an article on unemployment, that I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, February 20, 1928]

SMITH SPEEDS AID FOR HOSTS OF IDLE, LARGEST SINCE 1921—SENDS TO MAYORS AND COUNTY OFFICIALS HAMILTON'S REPORT ON SERIOUS CONDITION IN STATE—ASKS THEM TO FIND WORK—"SERIOUS DISTRESS" IS CERTAIN UNLESS MEASURES ARE TAKEN, SAYS INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONER—SITUATION IS DISSECTED—LARGE NUMBERS FOUND OUT OF WORK HERE AND MORE THOUSANDS IN UP-STATE CITIES

(Special to the New York Times)

ALBANY, N. Y., February 19.—Extensive unemployment in many parts of the State has been found by State Industrial Commissioner Hamilton in the course of a survey made at the request of Governor Smith. A report by Mr. Hamilton indicating a condition of unemployment that has not been experienced in the State since 1921 was made public to-day by Governor Smith, who transmitted copies of it to mayors of cities and to chairmen of county boards of supervisors.

In a covering letter the governor said:

"On February 4 I requested the industrial commissioner, through the division of employment, to make a rapid survey of the conditions of unemployment affecting New York City and as many cities of the State as possible. He presented his report February 15.

"I immediately called a meeting of the governor's cabinet, made up of the department heads, and submitted the report to them with a request that all public works undertaken by the State be speeded up in an effort to relieve the situation.

"I inclose herewith a copy of the report, with the respectful suggestion that proper steps with respect to your local improvements be taken in order that you may be able to help relieve the present unemployment situation."

Commissioner Hamilton, who made his survey with the aid of the welfare council of New York City, representing about 1,200 social welfare agencies, and used department agencies for inquiry as to conditions in the State outside of New York City, points out that since no census of unemployment has ever been made, it is impossible to give authoritative figures on the present extent.

"In the beginning, it may be pointed out that the evidence at hand indicates an extensive amount of unemployment, and that serious distress has been caused," says the report.

"No man can safely predict the future, but it is certainly true that if the present condition is not relieved distress will increase. If industrial conditions grow worse, growing unemployment, with its attendants of want and illness, will become an inevitable result. One has to go back to 1921 to find an employment situation rivaling the present."

DECREASE IN EMPLOYMENT INDEX

Commissioner Hamilton says that, on the basis of reports received regularly by the State department of labor from 1,650 manufacturers employing 500,000 workers, the index of employment has been dropping since the spring of 1926. His report says:

"In December, 1927, the index of such employment was below that of December, 1921. In January, 1928, there was a further decline of 2 per cent, bringing the index below that of January, 1921."

Commissioner Hamilton is referring to the index figure of 91 for January, as compared with 93 for December, 1927. He says that, though the department of labor does not receive returns from building employers comparable to those from manufacturers, it does receive returns showing "markedly less building in 1927 than in the preceding year."

"The returns received each month from the building departments of 23 cities of New York State as to building permits issued indicate a decrease in the estimated cost of such building work of 13 per cent in 1927, as compared with 1926," he reports.

Commissioner Hamilton attaches to his report a transcript of the hearing on unemployment held recently in New York City, including the memorandum submitted by the welfare council, the essentials of which have been published.

SITUATION IN NEW YORK CITY

Commissioner Hamilton also includes in his report figures collected by agents of the department of labor throughout the State. The situation in New York City, with a population of 5,873,356, is described as follows:

"A serious unemployment condition exists for the colored population. The Urban League reports that while in January, 1927, they had 365 applicants for every 100 jobs, in January, 1928, there were 1,075 applicants for every 100 jobs.

"The Bronx Young Men's Christian Association reports in January, 1927, 568 applicants for every 100 jobs; in January, 1928, there were 776 applicants for every 100 jobs.

"The Vocational Service for Juniors reports that in January, 1927, for minors between 14 and 18 years there were more than enough jobs to go around; in January, 1928, there were no jobs for at least one-third of the children.

"The American Legion of Bronx County reports on an average of 100 veterans a week seeking employment and 90 per cent of these married men with families.

"Two large commercial employment agencies placing office and clerical help report 100 per cent increase in the number of applicants for jobs; that these represent no more high-type people than are usually looking for positions, but many more so-called second-rate workers.

TAKING JOBS "AT ANY WAGES"

"The Sixth Avenue agencies for hotels and restaurant workers report a stream of applicants in and out all day long with no available jobs. A great many of them are from outside of New York City. Men will take jobs at any wages.

"The commissioner of licenses reports that in the commercial employment bureaus in this city the demand for workers is 10 per cent less than last winter, whereas the number seeking work is 10 per cent greater.

"Of the skilled workers the Employing Printers' Association reports more applicants for work in January, 1928, than any month during the last six years.

"The Amalgamated Clothing Workers, with a membership of 45,000, report 15,000 out of work, with the year 1927 a 'very bad year.'

"The president of the State Federation of Labor reports an acute employment situation among their members, excepting the United Hat Workers, who are better off than they ever were."

CONDITIONS IN UP-STATE CITIES

Six up-State cities, with a total population of 1,258,683, are declared to have between 65,000 and 70,000 persons out of work and evidence of further decline in employment is indicated.

Buffalo, with a population of 538,016, has about 35,000 to 40,000 unemployed. Conditions in the chemical industry, metal and machine groups, foundries, steel mills, and building trades are below normal. Automotive operations and flour milling are in fairly good shape, according to the report, while 40 per cent of the leading building trades' workers are idle, with about 8,000 unemployed.

"Relief agencies' figures show that for the first time since 1921 the city mission has organized a bread line feeding 200 daily," continues the report. "The Erie County lodging house for the first time since 1921 has opened an emergency annex."

In Rochester, with a population of 316,786, the chamber of commerce reports 10,000 out of work. In the men's clothing industry, the fourth largest in the country, about 50 per cent of the workers are idle, with a similar percentage of unemployed reported by bricklayers, masons, and carpenters.

"The chief of police reports that not since 1922 has there been so many applicants for relief as within the last three months," the report adds.

In Syracuse, with a population of 182,003, the employers' associations estimate the unemployed as between 5,000 and 7,000, about one-third in the building trades.

FOUR PER CENT DECLINE IN ALBANY

Regarding Albany, with a population of 117,820, the Hamilton report says:

"The State employment bureau reports a decrease in employment of 4 per cent since January, 1927.

"Printing and paper products report an improvement in conditions in the last few months. Textiles report some part-time work. Shirts and collars, tobacco, the chemical industry, and cement are normal.

"The metal and machinery industry reports a decrease in employment of about 15 per cent, while the railroad-equipment shops report a short work week and a lay-off of almost a week each month for each employee.

"In the electrical-equipment industry, while practically all workers have been retained on the pay roll, a great many are experiencing short-time employment.

"In the building trades about one-third are out of work."

Newburgh and Kingston report that employment of women is normal, but that there is scarcity of work for men. Poughkeepsie reports between 200 and 300 unemployed out of a population of 35,000.

NORMALITY IN THE "ALBANY DISTRICT"

In the Albany district Glens Falls, Middletown, Fort Edward, Johnstown, and Amsterdam report conditions about normal. Plattsburg and Malone also report normal conditions.

"Of two large firms in Schenectady canvassed," says the report, "one reports worse conditions than in 1921, and another firm which in October, 1927, employed 19,600 workers, now employs 1,200 fewer, some of whom are on part time."

Trades-unions in Elmira, with a population of 48,359, report 300 men out of work, while in Binghamton, with a population of 71,915, the chamber of commerce estimates that almost 3,000 men and 500 women are out of work. In Dunkirk one company reports 2,000 men out of work, with two other concerns operating at 75 per cent of normal.

The secretary of the Industrial Employment Association in Utica, with a population of 101,604, reports that about 4,500 are unemployed, as against 2,500 at the same time last year and 6,500 in 1921.

Unemployment exists also in Albion, Batavia, East Rochester, Fairport, Medina, and Geneva. At the last-named town, with a population of 15,908, 70 per cent of the unskilled and 10 per cent of the skilled workers are out of work.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah what the situation is regarding the public-building program. What prospect is there that work on public buildings which have been authorized may be inaugurated so that to some degree unemployment may be relieved?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that within a month or a month and a half the Treasury Department expects to ask for bids upon the buildings of the Department of Commerce between D and E Streets on Fifteenth Street and also to ask for bids for the Internal Revenue Building, those being two of the largest buildings that will be erected within the triangle. The Government owns the land and, I presume, the Senator has already noticed that quite a number of temporary buildings have been demolished and the work of excavation has proceeded to a considerable extent. I presume he also knows that the employees of the Internal Revenue Bureau have been moved into the Press Club Building, which will permit of the demolition of the remainder of the temporary buildings and enable the work on the erection of the two buildings I have named to be undertaken.

I will also say to the Senator that money has been appropriated to proceed with the work on the buildings, and we hope that the bids will shortly be received, after which the actual construction may begin.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for that information; it is very cheering.

Now let me ask about the public buildings around the country. How much is that appropriation—$100,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. The first appropriation for post office and other public buildings throughout the United States was for $100,000,000. There was a provision in that bill limiting the amount that might be expended in any one State to $5,000,000. At this session of Congress we have already passed an additional bill authorizing $100,000,000 more——

Mr. COPELAND. In addition to the first $100,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and increasing the amount that may be expended in any one State to $10,000,000. That will take care of buildings in New York and Pennsylvania and one or two other States which could not be proceeded with under the $5,000,000 limitation; in fact, bids could not even be asked for. So I think that the legislation which has been enacted will take care of the public-buildings situation in New York and Philadelphia and some other cities, including, I think, Detroit, where additional accommodations are urgently needed.

Mr. COPELAND. There can be no doubt, in view of the report made by the industrial commission to the governor of my State that there is a tremendous amount of unemployment in the State of New York, and also, I judge from the newspapers, in other States. I hold in my hand a letter from the Henry Street Settlement District Nurses, where there are 200 nurses making a thousand calls a day, in which reference is made to the serious effects of unemployment among the wage earners and their families in New York City.

Governor Smith has recommended to the mayors of the cities of my State and all along the line down through the various subdivisions of government that, so far as possible, public work contemplated be carried on at this time. I think that we ought to remove whatever restrictions are upon the Federal buildings appropriations. This should be done in order that we may proceed at once wherever we contemplate within the next year or two doing any building.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the provisions of existing law $20,000,000 are provided every year for Government post offices and buildings outside of the District of Columbia, and in the District of Columbia, I will say to the Senator, that of the appropriation of $50,000,000 there has already been provided for the buildings that we really need and must have within the triangle $20,000,000, which was made available this year, and before it will be possible to complete the two mammoth buildings which are going up it will be necessary to have another $10,000,000.

As to the appropriations for buildings outside of the District of Columbia, there has been provided $25,000,000, together with an additional $25,000,000, making $50,000,000 in all. So, taking it all in all, there are $70,000,000 a year that ought to be expended and that will be expended as rapidly as the expenditure can prudently be made.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator, Would it upset the program if we made more money available for immediate use? For instance, in my State, where we have a tremendous population—12,000,000 people—would it not be possible to make available a larger amount of money for public buildings which are already planned for?

Mr. SMOOT. If we did that, it would require an authorization for more than the $20,000,000. The $10,000,000 specifically provided for New York State will be allocated among the larger cities, and there is another $10,000,000 available, making $20,000,000 now for that purpose.

I doubt whether there could be any further appropriations made profitably to the Government for the erection of buildings all over the country at this time. Perhaps next year we can add to the appropriation, but not now, because the amount now appropriated is all the money that can possibly be spent here within the next year.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand that my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] has made a request of the Labor Department for a report on labor conditions. As I view it, we should get that report at the earliest moment. That will help us to plan some of our public-building activities. To carry on with them now might bridge over a very serious labor situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I might add to what the Senator has said that it would be a very good thing, too, if the counties and cities that contemplate the erection of public buildings should erect them now if there is labor that is unemployed.

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly what the governor of my State has done, as the Senator will see when he reads the article from the New York Times, which I have inserted in the RECORD. He has called upon mayors and supervisors and all those in authority to see to it that these public works are carried on.

Mr. President, this is a matter which every Senator should be thinking of now, because we are facing a very serious situation in the labor field. Some means of correcting it must be found. We must not permit any other consideration in this particular year to interfere with doing the things which will give employment, so far as may be, to relieve distress.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk the conference report on H. R. 9136, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the conference report?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was about to ask if the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was here. I did not like to have this matter taken up in his absence. I see that he is present, however.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I have just made the conference report on the Interior Department bill, and have asked unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand, Mr. President, that the matter is going over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. At the request of some of the Senators interested in the report, I shall ask that it go over until to-morrow.

DUTY ON SHINGLES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, out of order, I beg leave to offer an amendment to H. R. 1. I ask to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Finance; and I should like to make just a few remarks at this time on the amendment.

This proposal is for a 25 per cent ad valorem tariff on shingles and cedar lumber. I desire to state briefly my reasons for offering it for adoption when the revenue bill shall come before the Senate.

MUST HAVE TARIFF NOW

Unless we protect the shingle and cedar industry of the Northwest at this session of Congress, it will probably be destroyed before any tariff can be provided. The next session of Congress will be the short session. It will be impossible to get tariff legislation. This means that two more years must elapse before the Congress can consider legislation to save an industry that has been producing more than 5,000,000,000 shingles annually in the United States.

The tariff act of 1922, which provided an American tariff on logs, and free shingles, and the Canadian export tariff on logs have already destroyed one-half of the shingle production in the Northwest, and brought an increase of 317 per cent in the importation of Canadian shingles. Canadian mills use 54 per cent oriental labor to produce their shingles. Thus the present tariff law passed by the American Congress actually protects foreign production and oriental labor, and handicaps and discriminates against American production and American labor in the shingle and cedar lumber industries. This American tariff law in practice subsidizes oriental labor, and penalizes American labor in the United States, when that American labor is attempting to produce American products for American consumption.

An American tariff act has already destroyed one-half of the shingle industry that existed in 1922 and forced one-half of the remaining shingle mills into bankruptcy. This industry represents a $50,000,000 investment, with an annual production of $30,000,000 in value, and employs 30,000 men at good wages.

ORIENTAL EXCLUSION A JOKE

The operation of this part of the 1922 tariff law has made oriental exclusion in the Northwest a joke. It forces the mills that are operating to close one-third of the year. This means a loss of $10,000,000 in wages to our workingmen. It compels American workmen to walk the streets in idleness while orientals in British Columbia are working double shifts to make shingles and cedar lumber for American consumption.

Think of it! A tariff law passed by the American Congress is exterminating a great industry, pauperizing American workingmen, and bringing stagnation to American commerce.

The West is a great and growing section. When Congress stunts or handicaps its development the whole country suffers as well. The people must necessarily buy less food and clothing, fewer automobiles, and less merchandise of every kind produced in the East.

WHY CONGRESS DOES NOT ACT

Why does Congress not act? In reply, let me read from a letter from Mr. A. C. Edwards, of Everett, Wash., chairman of the tariff committee on the shingle and cedar lumber industries, who came to Washington to learn why Congress refuses to act. In a letter explaining the situation, he says:

Administration circles oppose tariff consideration. This, properly analyzed, means that Secretary Kellogg, representing American owners of Canadian mills and timber, with the assistance of Secretary Mellon, representing highly protected interests, are controlling administrative policies.

Commenting on this statement, the Seattle Star says:

There you have it, in black and white. Kellogg, instead of attending to his business as Secretary of State, helps juggle things in favor of his friends who send their speculative dollar out of America. This is precisely his course in Nicaragua, too.

And Mr. Mellon, booned with an aluminum tariff that has increased his trust capital from $1,500,000 to $200,000,000 in seven years, helps to benefit eastern industries at the expense of western manufacturing.

And above them sits Calvin Coolidge, obeying orders.

This is an amazing situation. It is a disgrace, this subversion of popular government to the needs of a few pet industries.

What the Northwest should do about it is get fighting mad. We should demonstrate, plainly, that we are never going to let up in the battle until we get justice.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate further now to discuss this amendment, but will enlarge upon my views when the revenue bill comes before the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent to have another editorial on this subject printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Seattle Star]

TWO CITIZENS; OR, MR. CARLSON'S ERROR

A few years ago a couple of American citizens got new jobs. The President had just made one of his numerous speeches predicting prosperity for everybody, and both citizens went heartily to work. Both hoped to share in the promised prosperity.

One of the citizens was a Pittsburgh banker, Andrew Mellon by name. He got a job as Secretary of the American Treasury. Mr. Mellon also was guiding spirit in the American Aluminum Trust. It was just a little trust, capitalized at a paltry $1,500,000, in those days.

The other citizen was Andrew Carlson, of Everett. He got a job with a cedar mill at Everett, turning out shingles. Mr. Carlson was the guiding spirit in one American home. It was just a little home, worth about $1,500; but a wife and two happy children made it worth more—to Mr. Carlson.

The prosperity the President had promised soon began to work. Mr. Mellon's struggling little aluminum industry got a fine new tariff. Practically all the bauxite, from which aluminum is made, is mined in the South, so it was difficult to see how foreign manufacturers could compete very strongly—but Mr. Mellon got his tariff just the same.

That was in 1922. And just to show you how true was the President's prediction, the struggling little aluminum industry to-day is capitalized at a beggarly $200,000,000. When you bought that new aluminum kettle for the wife—well, that helped. You did your bit for Mr. Mellon.

Mr. Carlson, of Everett, however, had tougher going. You see, he lives in the wild and untamed Northwest where, as everyone back East knows, horrid cowboys fight Indians and men have hair in their ears—something never permitted in Pittsburgh.

The wild and uncivilized nor'westerners—Mr. Carlson and his boss and a few thousand others—wanted a moderate tariff on shingles. Canada was producing shingles with Jap, Chinese, and Hindu labor far more cheaply than Mr. Carlson's boss could and still help Mr. Carlson maintain his family in decency.

But the Northwest couldn't be heard above the racket made by the dollars falling into the aluminum pan. There was some disturbance, too, due to the fact that the President was firing off nine prosperity speeches a week.

Because of all this racket shingles stayed on the free list; Canada shipped in more than Washington made to supply American demand. Mills closed down and finally, some weeks ago, Mr. Carlson found himself out of a job. He has been that way ever since, and he wonders. * * *

This is just the simple tale of two American citizens and their courses through life during a few years. We might go on and point a moral, but our moral pointer has gone home for the day, and this editorial is too long, anyway.

Mr. Carlson's error, of course, was not in investing in aluminum stock. * * *

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Washington will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 21, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 20 (legislative day of February 17), 1928

JUDGE OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS

William Raymond Green, of Iowa, to be judge of the Court of Claims of the United States, vice James Hay, resigned.

FOREIGN SERVICE

To be secretary in Diplomatic Service

Royal R. Jordan, of Massachusetts, now a Foreign Service officer, unclassified, and a vice consul of career, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

George L. Foote, of Indianapolis, Ind., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Indiana in place of M. Bert Thurman, resigned.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

Douglas Smith, of Alabama, to be United States marshal, middle district of Alabama. A reappointment, his term having expired.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY

Commander William R. Furlong to be a captain in the Navy from the 11th day of September, 1927.

Lieut. Commander Lemuel E. Lindsay to be a commander in the Navy from the 1st day of July, 1927.

Lieut. Commander Augustine W. Rieger to be a commander in the Navy from the 15th day of February, 1928.

Lieut. John J. Twomey to be a lieutenant commander in the Navy from the 2d day of October, 1927.

Lieut. Samuel B. Brewer to be a lieutenant commander in the Navy from the 16th day of November, 1927.

Lieut. Franklin S. Irby to be a lieutenant commander in the Navy from the 15th day of February, 1928.

Ensign George W. Allen to be a lieutenant (junior grade) in the Navy from the 9th day of February, 1927.

Asst. Surg. Walter F. J. Karbach to be a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, with the rank of lieutenant, from the 1st day of July, 1927.

Asst. Dental Surg. Gunnar N. Wennerberg to be a passed assistant dental surgeon in the Navy, with the rank of lieutenant, from the 1st day of July, 1927.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 20 (legislative day of February 17), 1928

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Norman A. Dodge to be United States attorney, northern district of Texas.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

George A. Mauk to be United States marshal, district of Arizona.

POSTMASTERS

CALIFORNIA

Anna L. Monroe, Ferndale.
Dwight E. Knapp, Garberville.
Herma L. McBain, Hamilton City.
May C. Baker, Paradise.

FLORIDA

Thomas J. Bulford, Hilliard.

IOWA

Wilbur F. Busby, Creston.
Alvah S. Dukes, Unionville.

NEBRASKA

Edgar W. Meth, Arthur.

NORTH CAROLINA

William H. Manning, Bethel.
Abner W. Smith, Boone.
George E. Kestler, Concord.
May C. Campbell, Norwood.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, February 20, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Spirit divine, do Thou come to us that we may dwell together. There shall be a union of infinite might and human frailty. Thy holy word is with us: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Oh, it is a mighty soul that can pity and forgive! He feels their appeal and tries to give them relief. We would pass by genius, wealth, and victory over enemies and ask Thee for the blessing of forgiving hearts and strong, decisive minds. This should be the underlying purpose of our beings. Magnify Thyself and enable us to carry serviceableness, cheer, and faithfulness into every duty of this day. Help the dark places of the world and bless them with heavenly light. In the name of Jesus, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 18, 1928, they presented to the President of the United States for his approval a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9660. An act authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message from the President of the United States was presented to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President did on the following dates approve and sign bills of the House of the following titles:

On January 30, 1928:

H. R. 9022. An act to authorize the town of Alderson, W. Va., to maintain a public highway upon the premises occupied by the Federal Industrial Institution of Women at Alderson, W. Va.; and

H. R. 6053. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Linden-Lexington Road, in Perry and Decatur Counties, Tenn.

On February 3, 1928:

H. R. 5547. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of St. Joseph in the State of Missouri, or its assigns, to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between the States of Missouri and Kansas;

H. R. 280. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Red River at or near Coushatta, La.;

H. R. 5642. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across Red River at Fulton, Ark.;

H. R. 5582. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Rio Grande at or near the point where South Santa Fe Street in the city of El Paso crosses the Rio Grande, in the county of El Paso, State of Texas; and

H. R. 7218. An act to legalize a bridge across Hillsborough Bay at Twenty-second Street, Tampa, Fla.

On February 4, 1928:

H. J. Res. 81. Joint resolution for the amendment of the act of March 3, 1927, by authorizing an annual appropriation to carry out the cooperative experiments contemplated by the act; and

H. J. Res. 93. Joint resolution for the appointment of Paul E. Divine, of Tennessee, as member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

On February 6, 1928:

H. R. 5725. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, La.;

H. R. 5726. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Black River at or near Jonesville, La.; and

H. R. 5728. An act granting the consent of Congress to the police jury of Morehouse Parish, La., or the State Highway Commission of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew at or near Point Pleasant, La.

On February 7, 1928:

H. R. 9142. An act to amend section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended, by changing time of holding court at El Dorado and Harrison, Ark.; and

H. J. Res. 112. Joint resolution to amend the act of May 29, 1884, as amended, the act of February 2, 1903, and the act of March 3, 1905, as amended, to include poultry within their provisions.

On February 8, 1928:

H. R. 5657. An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Monroe County, Miss., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Tombigbee River at or near Aberdeen, Monroe County, Miss.

On February 10, 1928:

H. R. 10636. An act to make an additional appropriation for the water boundary, United States and Mexico.

On February 11, 1928:

H. R. 3400. An act to correct the military record of Andrew B. Ritter;

H. R. 5228. An act for the relief of Finas M. Williams;

H. R. 5994. An act for the relief of George C. Hussey;

H. R. 6162. An act for the relief of Thomas M. Ross;

H. R. 2138. An act for the relief of the owner of the schooner Sentinel;

H. R. 2145. An act for the relief of Albert J. Zyvolski;

H. R. 4393. An act for the relief of Howard V. Sloan; and

H. R. 6466. An act granting a part of the Federal building site at Phoenix, Ariz., to the city of Phoenix for street purposes.

On February 13, 1928:

H. R. 172. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the city of Vancouver a perpetual easement for public highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vancouver Barracks Military Reservation in the State of Washington;

H. R. 164. An act to authorize appropriations for construction at the Pacific Branch Soldiers' Home, Los Angeles County, Calif., and for other purposes;

H. R. 8092. An act for the relief of Randolph Sias;

H. R. 766. An act for the relief of Ida F. Baum;

H. R. 1405. An act granting six months' pay to Maria J. McShane;

H. R. 4127. An act for the relief of Joel T. Smith;

H. R. 4707. An act for the relief of Calvin H. Burkhead; and

H. R. 4777. An act to compensate Robert F. Yeaman for the loss of certain carpenter tools which was incurred by reason of a fire in the Government area at Old Hickory Ordnance Depot.

H. R. 4995. An act for the relief of Sabino Apodaca;

H. R. 5300. An act for the relief of Lewis H. Francke and Blanche F. Shelley, sole legal heirs of Ralph K. Warrington; and

H. R. 8889. An act for the relief of Adriano Cruceta, a citizen of the Dominican Republic.

On February 14, 1928:

H. R. 7013. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks, to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928.

On February 15, 1928:

H. R. 6045. An act granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the existing bridge across the Mahoning River at South Avenue, Youngstown, Mahoning County, Ohio;

H. R. 6099. An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York and Vermont to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain between Crown Point, N. Y., and Chimney Point, Vt.;

H. R. 6483. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois, the county of Lee, and the city of Dixon, or to any or either of them, jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rock River at Dixon, Ill.;

H. R. 6958. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River at Youngstown, Mahoning County, Ohio;

H. R. 8269. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 8369. An act for the relief of Josephine Thibodeaux.

On February 16, 1928:

H. J. Res. 104. Joint resolution granting consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of New York and the State of Vermont for the creation of the Lake Champlain Bridge Commission and to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge across Lake Champlain;

H. R. 108. An act granting the consent of Congress to the States of North Dakota and Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Red River of the North;

H. R. 193. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Clearwater, Minn.;

H. R. 194. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Morrison, State of Minnesota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Little Falls, Minn.;

H. R. 199. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Monticello, Wright County, Minn.;

H. R. 319. An act to legalize a bridge across the Snake River at Idaho Falls, Idaho;

H. R. 444. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Wolf Point, Mont.;

H. R. 495. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Armstrong, a county of the State of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, at Kittanning, in the county of Armstrong, in the State of Pennsylvania;

H. R. 5510. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Duluth, Minn., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Duluth Ship Canal;

H. R. 5583. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. of Texas and the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rio Grande River, at or near Presidio, Tex.;

H. R. 5628. An act to extend the time for commencing and the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River;

H. R. 5638. An act granting the consent of Congress to rebuild and reconstruct and to maintain and operate the existing railroad bridge across the Tombigbee River, at Epes, in the State of Alabama;

H. R. 5744. An act granting the consent of Congress for the reconstruction of a bridge across the Grand Calumet River at East Chicago, Ind.;

H. R. 6041. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Allegheny River;

H. R. 6046. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River at or near West Avenue, Youngstown, Mahoning County, Ohio;

H. R. 6479. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River between the borough of Wrightsville, in York County, Pa., and the borough of Columbia, in Lancaster County, Pa.;

H. R. 6512. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Cook, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Little Calumet River at or near Wentworth Avenue, in Cook County, State of Illinois;

H. R. 6513. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Cook, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Little Calumet River at or near Ashland Avenue, in Cook County, State of Illinois;

H. R. 6514. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Cook, State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Little Calumet River at or near Indiana Avenue, in Cook County, State of Illinois;

H. R. 6959. An act to legalize a bridge across the Caney Fork River in De Kalb County, Tenn.;

H. R. 7192. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River between the municipalities of Rochester and Monaca, Beaver County, Pa.;

H. R. 7370. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Idaho to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Snake River near Indian Cove, Idaho;

H. R. 7374. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Idaho to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Snake River near Swan Valley, Idaho;

H. R. 7466. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Montana, Valley County, Mont., and McCone County, Mont., or to any or either of them, jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Glasgow, Mont.;

H. R. 7745. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Chicago & North Western Railway Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Rock River;

H. R. 7902. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Coosa River at or near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.;

H. R. 7913. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across Elk River on the Athens-Florence road between Lauderdale and Limestone Counties, Ala.; and

H. R. 473. An act authorizing the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.

On February 18, 1928:

H. R. 3926. An act for the relief of Joseph Jameson; and

H. R. 7009. An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

On February 20, 1928:

H. R. 6487. An act authorizing the Baton Rouge-Mississippi River Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Baton Rouge, La.;

H. R. 7916. An act authorizing the Madison Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Madison, Jefferson County, Ind.; and

H. R. 9186. An act authorizing the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va.

REPORT ON RESERVOIR CONTROL OF FLOOD WATERS

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report on reservoir control of flood waters. I know the subject is of vital importance at this session. I want you all to read the report of Judge DRIVER, chairman of subcommittee on reservoirs for flood control. It is well worthy of being read by every citizen and by every Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following report of Judge DRIVER, of Arkansas, made to the Flood Control Committee of the House while it was considering the subject of flood control.

The engineering profession, including civil and Army, are in accord on the theory that the ideal method of controlling floods is through the use of reservoirs by means of which waters are impounded and controlled in the source streams.

Recognition of the importance of reservoir control was given by the Chief of Engineers in the appointment of a special board of six members from the Corps of Engineers on the 11th day of June, 1927, and directions for an investigation into their feasibility. The Mississippi River Commission also directed one of its members, Col. C. W. Kutz, to cover the same subject, resulting in a comprehensive report by the reservoir board selected by the Chief of Engineers and headed by Col. William Kelly, and an abbreviated statement by the member selected by the Mississippi River Commission contained in the Mississippi River Commission report.

It appears from the report and hearings that within the period from June 11 to about November 1, 1927, some 500 reservoir sites were investigated from reports and studies, with practically all of the information used furnished by less than a dozen district engineers.

Both reports indorsed the theory of reservoir control, but rejected the same because of the economies involved, compared with the expense of other methods of control.

The question, therefore, occurs whether or not the investigations were sufficient to offer a basis of comparison and whether or not the hearings were sufficient to enable the committee to make a comparison of the costs of reservoir control with the plans of control advocated by the Chief of Engineers and by the Mississippi River Commission.

It is reasonable to assume that an ideal method of dealing with the problem would suggest the necessity for the exercise of the highest degree of care and thoroughness in an investigation touching the feasibility of its use and the element of expense involved. Therefore, the character of the investigation made is a proper subject of inquiry.

One of the first commissions created to deal with headwater improvement was the flood commission of Pittsburgh, composed of men of experience and assisted by engineers of eminence. Many months were spent by this commission in the study of their problem in the limited territory at the headwater areas and along the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, which formed the Ohio River.

Another board dealing with a similar subject was the interstate commission created to deal with the Arkansas, Red, and White River areas, which board devoted many months to the study of the headwater areas, tributary streams, and the main channels within their sphere of duty. Both commissions have filed elaborate reports covering their investigations, with recommendations governing particular sites, capacities, and elements of costs, and which are part of the records of the hearings before this committee. The duties charged to the commissions mentioned involved only investigations of limited areas, and received the undivided attention of the engineers performing the technical work required.

It appears that the investigation made by the member of the Mississippi River Commission was not a personal one, but made entirely from the reports of district engineers, while the reservoir board, in addition to the reports of such district engineers, availed itself of such information as could be procured from reports touching reservoir location and construction made to the various departments of the Government, but in no instance did any one site have the benefit of an observation by a single member of the board. At the same time, from the nature of the duties of the district engineers, it must be assumed that but little time was devoted to the study of the subject of their report. In fact, an examination of the reports of the Pittsburgh and interstate boards, containing an elaborate report of study of surveys and estimates of costs based on a personal investigation of each site, and with data secured by a thorough investigation and knowledge of the precipitation and stream flow, which required many months to collect, is the strongest evidence of the insufficiency of the investigations of the Mississippi River Commission and the reservoir board.

RELATIVE COSTS

The Chief of Engineers estimates the costs of necessary flood works under the plan advocated by him at $184,000,000, excluding revetment and rights of way (which amounts to 2,000,000 acres of land in flood ways and the enlarged diversion channels through the Atchafalaya Basin), the value of which land, according to the estimate of the Mississippi River Commission, is $91,000,000, to which must be added the Birds Point flood way area estimated by L. T. Berthe, consulting engineer for the district in which same is located, at $18,500,000, aggregating $294,500,000.

The Mississippi River Commission comprehensive plan is estimated to cost $625,000,000 for flood-control works, with an interim plan designed to protect against a flood equal to that of 1927, at an estimated expense of $332,500,000, both of which last-mentioned estimates include the value of required rights of way.

It is therefore difficult to find a basis for comparison in the real costs under the methods suggested in the Chief of Engineers and the Mississippi River Commission plans, with the record evidence in the hearings of the cost of reservoir control.

The data and comments of Mr. E. E. Blake, of the interstate commission, on the general problem of reservoirs and estimate of cost, is worthy of serious consideration and is inserted here:

Characteristics of the Arkansas, Red, Missouri, Ohio, and upper Mississippi Basins for comparative approximation of cost of control

	Drainage area in square miles	Relative size	Average precipitation per annum
Arkansas-White	186,000	1	29
Missouri	528,850	3	23
Ohio	203,000	1.1	45
Upper Mississippi	187,850	1	31
Red	90,000	.5	40

Assuming the work of the interstate commission for the control of the Arkansas to be approximately correct, it could be completed at a cost of $75,000,000, and addition of the White at an estimated cost of $25,000,000, and the total Arkansas-White, $100,000,000.

The Missouri, with three times the area, would be, roughly approximated, $300,000,000, but this does not follow, as the rainfall is 25 per cent less, and, therefore the quantity of water to be controlled would mathematically be only 75 per cent of $300,000,000, or $225,000,000, figured on a geographical basis. However, the major part of the control of the Missouri would be above Kansas City, as the river is amply able to carry its run-off below Kansas City. The average precipitation above is only 18.9 inches, which as compared to the Arkansas would, on ratio of precipitation, bring the approximate cost of control relative to Arkansas as double, or $200,000,000.

Considering the relative length of the Arkansas and the Missouri, and the relative length of their tributaries, and considering the longer period of discharge and the greater regularity of flow, the relative gradients, the relative precipitation by snow and water separately, and the seasonal differences, as reflected by the Mississippi River Commission's report of observations for the past 87 years, the ratio of cost of control again changes and the estimated cost of control's relation to the Arkansas would fix the Missouri at $180,000,000.

Considering the eastermost area of each basin and the normal precipitation thereon and the necessity for control therein and the comparative approximate estimates of control therein, a marked difference of about 90 per cent is disclosed which, reflected in cost of control as to the eastern area, reduces the ratio of the Missouri which, calculated in dollars, represents about $23,000,000. We are thus safe in estimating a control of the Missouri Basin at relatively 50 per cent more than the Arkansas and White Basin.

This is a great variance from the purely geographic area estimate heretofore, but is justified when the individual elements are considered. We therefore feel safe in asserting that the Missouri River could be adequately controlled and kept in the undestructive limit at its high stages and above an unusable limit at its low stages for approximately $150,000,000.

Comparative study of the upper Mississippi Basin with relation to the interstate work out of the Arkansas.

Geographically considered they are almost parallel; they are almost the same in size. In annual precipitation they are almost the same. In character of precipitation they are vastly different, a large part being snow, from which the run-off is materially less than from an equal amount of rain.

Considering that portion of the upper Mississippi Basin of low precipitation and that part having the greatest precipitation, we find that both are materially below the Arkansas areas of similar characteristics.

Considering the character of flow and the character of the country for inexpensive control, the length of the stream and its gradient, and the periodicity of discharge, the dissimilarity of the characteristics in the two streams is still marked.

Without repeating the details recited as to the Missouri, we find that, to be perfectly safe, we figure an adequate control of the upper Mississippi at not exceeding $40,000,000 to keep it below a destructive limit and above an interruption of commerce limit.

Considering the Ohio Subbasin with relation to the Arkansas Subbasin:

In geographic area the Ohio is 10 per cent greater, and on a strictly geographical basis the cost would be estimated $110,000,000.

Considering the rainfall, we discover a relative increase of substantially 50 per cent, which would indicate a cost of control of $150,000,000. However, considering the distribution of this rainfall through the year, we find much greater evenness of distribution which, carefully figured, reduces the ratio very materially.

Considering the areas of high precipitation on the Ohio Subbasin, to wit, Maryland, New York, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia, the areas are very small, the run-off undestructive locally and too small to be destructive in the longer streams and may be dropped from the equation as a discharge factor. However, should control in those areas be deemed expedient, economical opportunities therefor are abundant.

This leaves only the areas of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee as material contributing elements, aggregating less than the Arkansas Basin, so that, considering the essential area of the Ohio Basin with relation to its annual precipitation, and with relation to the seasonal distribution of precipitation and the ratio of estimated cost of control is materially reduced.

Considering now the relative gradients of the streams as affecting the quickness of discharge, we find that this element obtains on the Arkansas from source to mouth, while on the Ohio Subbasin it ceases at the approach and in the main stream. We find also a stream of tremendously greater capacity for storage and discharge, and, on account of the difference in the gradient, which for this purpose we take Cincinnati as an average, we find that about 13,000 cubic feet of water per second adds 1 foot to the high flow at Cincinnati as compared to 100,000 second-feet required for 1 foot additional rise in the Arkansas at Little Rock at high flow. So that a storage of 1 acre-foot on the Ohio affects the elevation of the peak of the flood about eight times as much as an equal storage on the Arkansas at Little Rock, and about five times as much as an equal amount of storage affects the peak of the floods on the Missouri at Kansas City.

Thus, the aggregate, complete, and comprehensive control of the Mississippi Basin, considered by its individual integers, aggregates $440,000,000.

We tender the suggestion, however, that, if the entire basin were treated as a unit and all the individual subbasins correlated by a comprehensive genius, a complete and adequate control could be brought within the limit of $500,000,000, assuring complete protection to the properties of the valleys from the source to sea, and assuring a permanent, stabilized, connecting system of streams for public convenience and welfare, the promotion and regulation of interstate commerce.

The economic benefit to the Nation from such a development would be tremendously important.

Agreement, however, is reached on the maximum flood heights to be protected against.

The predicted "maximum possible" gauge at Cairo is 66 feet, equivalent to the passing of 2,250,000 second-feet; Arkansas City, 74 feet, or 2,850,000 second-feet; and at Angola or the mouth of Old River, 71.5 feet or 3,000,000 second-feet.

The places mentioned are used because they are—

First. The point where the waters of the Missouri, upper Mississippi, and Ohio converge;

Second. Where the waters passing down the main channel of the Mississippi River from Cairo south converge with the waters of the White and Arkansas Rivers; and Third. Where the waters coming from the stated sources combine with the waters from the Red River and its tributaries.

It is conceded that a reduction of 6 feet on the gauge at Cairo, equivalent to 420,000 second-feet in volume of water, would create a state of perfect security for that city and the alluvial section from Cairo to the mouth of the Arkansas River, there being no streams of any consequence flowing into the main channel between said points. Therefore, we will look to the conditions in the Missouri, upper Mississippi, and Ohio watersheds.

First. The report of the reservoir board mentions 153 favorable sites, with a capacity of 64,100,000 acre-feet at an estimated cost of $1,046,000,000, or an average cost of $16.30 per acre-foot.

The Pittsburgh flood commission has selected 17 reservoir sites, estimated at a cost of $21,672,000, through which the flood stage at Pittsburgh on the Ohio River can be reduced from 10 to 12 feet, and which would influence a reduction in the flow of the Ohio of 150,000 second-feet at that point. Without the data on which to base any calculation, it is but reasonable to assume that a like expenditure in the same character of country, would afford an equivalent reduction in the flow of the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers and principal tributaries of the Ohio River, which would amount to 300,000 additional second-feet of storage, or an aggregate of 450,000 second-feet reduction at a cost of approximately $65,000,000.

It is asserted that the most pronounced reservoir effect on flood heights is given by those nearest the main stream, because of the diminution of the flow through absorption by the alluvial soil affecting the force of reservoirs on the headwater streams.

The extent of such influence is left in much doubt by the testimony in the record of the hearings, but the Army engineers have furnished a yardstick by which such effect should be estimated with reasonable accuracy and calculation. They state that the reduction in the flood flow of 1,850,000 second-feet from Cairo to the mouth of the Arkansas River, a distance of approximately 600 miles, would amount to 100,000 second-feet, or one-eighteenth of the entire volume. On the same basis of calculation, the reduction in the flood flow from Pittsburgh to Cairo, and an equivalent distance on the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers of 800 miles, would be 81,000 second-feet, or an influence at Cairo of 350,000 second-feet, which is equivalent to 5½ foot reduction in the gauge at Cairo.

Mr. Clark E. Mickey, professor of civil engineering in the University of Nebraska, is an engineer of wide experience, thoroughly qualified and intimately acquainted with the streams and conditions in the Missouri watershed.

After an investigation into the drainage, precipitation, and run-off therein, he offers a concrete example of the reservoir possibilities of that region. He states that by means of a large dam located on the Missouri River near Fort Clark, N. Dak., the run-off from 40 per cent of the Missouri River drainage basin can be stored, amounting to 15,000,000 acre-feet, at an estimated cost of $45,000,000. He further states that additional storage of 15,000,000 acre-feet may be obtained in the Great Plains region at an estimated cost of $10 per acre-foot. On the basis of the estimate of reduction in flow, the impounding of 30,000,000 acre-feet in the Missouri River watershed at an expense of $195,000,000 would be equivalent to the reduction in the discharge of 350,000 second-feet measured by the yardstick of the Army engineers. This would mean a reduced flood height at Cairo of slightly more than 250,000 second-feet, equivalent to a reduction in the gauge of 3½ feet. But little information is furnished by other than the Army engineers on the upper Mississippi possibilities.

The district engineer at St. Paul mentioned six reservoir sites, with an aggregate capacity of 2,152,000 acre-feet, at a cost of $1,322,000, or a per acre-foot cost of 61 cents. The estimate of effect on the gauge at Cairo was a reduction of 1,200 second-feet.

This is the cheapest storage mentioned by either Army or civilian engineers, and if reservoir sites are available in number sufficient at the same cost, the greatest possible effect may be found here at the least expense.

The flood at Cairo may not be from the combined Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Therefore, dependence can not be placed on a reduction made in one of the streams, and it becomes necessary to sufficiently control each of the streams to obtain the necessary influence on the flood heights at Cairo. Under the estimates made the necessary security is obtained.

The "maximum possible" flood flow is based on the combined effect of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Therefore, should the flood be from the combined flow, with a predicted maximum of 2,250,000 second-feet, we have a reduction on the Ohio of 350,000 second-feet, and 250,000 second-feet from the Mississippi, aggregating 600,000 second-feet, which diminishes the maximum flood flow to 1,650,000 second-feet. The existing levees at Cairo are sufficient to pass such flood in perfect security.

As the situation developed in the flood of 1922, the effect of the reservoir reduction on the Ohio, Tennessee, and Cumberland Rivers, would amount to 5½ feet, or a reduction in the gauge to 48.1 feet. Reversing the flows as same occurred in the flood of 1927 where the flood height was in the Mississippi, with an ordinary high-water stage in the Ohio, and the reduction would be 250,000 second-feet, or equivalent to a reduction of 3½ feet, or a gauge reduction from 58.5 feet to 55 feet.

The reductions calculated are based on the reservoir effect on the Ohio and Mississippi River stages at Cairo, and does not take into consideration any effect from such reservoir construction on the upper Mississippi, where no data is available on which to base calculation. The estimated expense of the necessary reservoir construction to obtain the diminished flow at Cairo would be $340,000,000, and would relieve against the necessity of constructing the spillway from Birds Point to New Madrid, reducing the flood heights in the unleveed basins on the east side of the Mississippi between Tiptonville and Memphis, Tenn., at least one-half, reduce the back water area at the mouth of the St. Francis 75 per cent and would reach the mouth of the Arkansas River with 1,550,000 second-feet, which is the amount leaving Cairo, minus 100,000 second-feet lost by absorption.

This would relieve against any additional levee construction between said points, estimated by the Chief of Engineers at $53,900,000, or $101,000,000 under the comprehensive plan of the Mississippi River Commission.

The most thorough investigation made by an agency in the watersheds of the Mississippi River is that of the interstate commission created in Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Arkansas, Louisiana, Colorado, and Kansas, with the object of conserving the waters, controlling floods, and improving the Arkansas, Red, and White Rivers and their tributary streams. This commission was headed by an able and enthusiastic conservationist, who secured the services of the most expert engineers. After an exhaustive study this board reports the complete control of the three rivers mentioned at an expense of $105,000,000.

The construction of two reservoirs on the Arkansas River, considered by the reservoir board and indorsed by the member of the Mississippi River Commission and which all of the engineers testifying in this case have admitted to be feasible, would lower the gauge in the flood flow of 1927 at Arkansas City about 7 feet. The reservoir board also reports that with 11 reservoirs constructed on the Arkansas and White Rivers a reduction of 8.4 feet would be had on the gauge at Arkansas City. An equivalent reduction in flood flow of 590,000 second-feet.

The interstate commission proposed under its estimate of expense to give effect to such control and by so doing, at a cost of $100,000,000, would effect a reduction to the ordinary mean flow of such rivers. Such flow would not exceed 350,000 second-feet. Such addition to the flood flow of 1,550,000 second-feet would produce 1,900,000 second-feet at the mouth of the Arkansas River and would carry to the Old River not exceeding that volume when Yazoo River contribution is added and absorption considered.

With the control of the Red River at an expense of $5,000,000, the flow of that stream would be reduced to less than 100,000 second-feet, with a capacity in the Atchafalaya, without additional flood-control works, of 450,000 second-feet, which would care for the waters from Red River and its tributaries, and also draw 350,000 second-feet out of the Mississippi, or reduce the flow from Old River down the main channel to 1,550,000 second-feet, with 250,000 drawn through the Bonnet Carre spillway, which would leave 1,300,000 second-feet to pass by New Orleans. This volume of water can be passed there without increase in grade or section of existing levees, and render unnecessary the construction of Cypress Creek and Atchafalaya diversions, at an estimated expense of $37,000,000 and levee enlargement cost of $89,700,000, aggregating $126,700,000, according to the Chief of Engineers and an estimate covering such diversions of $159,500,000 and enlarged levees between the mouth of the Arkansas River to the Passes estimated to cost $216,500,000, a total of $376,000,000, by the Mississippi River Commission.

The plan of the Chief of Engineers omits cost of land in flood ways, estimated by the Mississippi River Commission at $91,000,000, which must be added to his aggregate cost without regard to who may pay for it, which would increase his estimate to $217,000,000.

Therefore we have the plan of the Chief of Engineers with estimate of $318,400,000, and the comprehensive plan of the Mississippi River Commission at an estimated cost of $577,200,000.

The total estimated cost of a comprehensive reservoir control is placed at $445,000,000. E. E. Blake, the chairman of the interstate commission, asserts that contract with responsible parties can be entered into at any time for the amount of his estimate on reservoirs for the Red, Arkansas, and White River areas. If so, the estimates made on the other areas should be approximately accurate.

Certainly his estimates could not be more inaccurate than is offered by the Army engineers on the Cape Girardeau diversion, 300,000 second-feet, at the cost of $337,600,000, compared with the estimate made by the Morgan Engineering Co., the outstanding engineering organization of the country, and with an experience in and intimate knowledge of streams, topography, etc., in the affected area, which furnishes an estimate at a cost of $129,000,000 to afford the same amount of diversion, and through the same country.

The estimate referred to must of necessity depend upon a thorough study, with proper surveys, and by talent familiar with the subject, costs, etc., but the figures quoted are from the very best source of information available at this time, and when the other valuable uses to which the reservoirs may serve is considered, the promise is offered of an ideal method of control within the limit of the lowest estimated cost of levees and diversion, and much less than the maximum of cost of the more comprehensive plan embracing the same elements of control works. The latter carries no return beyond the protection afforded, with continued burden of maintenance.

Reservoir control will yield a return, increasing from year to year as the local developments within the sphere of their influence expand, saving to fruitful service the millions of acres of land proposed under levee and diversion control for flood ways and backwater areas and forever remove the dread fear of the valley from recurring floods. It will contribute the needed volume of water to the stream flows in periods of limited precipitation to guarantee navigation to our waterways and furnish to the areas where high freight rates prevail adequate transportation facilities at the cheapest possible cost.

INVITATION TO LUNCH

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to invite you and the membership of the House and members of the press at 1 o'clock to eat oysters in the basement of the Capitol. They are the famous Smyrna Bay oysters of North Carolina. These oysters were furnished through the courtesy of Mr. J. E. Woodland, of Morehead City, N. C., now in the gallery. [Applause.]

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow, Tuesday, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday at 11 o'clock a. m., with the understanding that if this is done the Farewell Address of George Washington will be read and the House will immediately thereafter adjourn in order to attend the celebration at Alexandria. I understand that similar action will probably be taken in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD including in them a very interesting and instructive address made at the Democratic editorial meeting at Indianapolis, Ind., February 16, by our minority leader, the Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT. It is a very able address, and I am sure will be read with much pleasure by everyone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, delivered by Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, of Tennessee, at the meeting of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association at Indianapolis on the night of February 16:

PARTY GOVERNMENT

Gentlemen of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association, I am deeply appreciative of the honor done me by the invitation to address your organization, and I thank you for it.

It is always a pleasure to come to Indiana, and no occasion could be more highly appreciated by me than is this.

I may say that no experience of my life has been more interesting to me than a few years during my young manhood when I was engaged in editing and publishing a small weekly newspaper. It was not a very pretentious organ but the experience was invaluable and I think it has always enabled me to get something of the editor's viewpoint and feeling.

I wish at the outset to express to you the genuine appreciation which is had by their associates in Washington of the three Democratic Representatives in Congress from Indiana, Messrs. CANFIELD, GARDNER, and GREENWOOD, the latter of whom is the chairman of our House caucus. These gentlemen are among the hard workers of the House, attentive to every duty, and loyal to every interest of our party and country. By reason of ability and industry they have taken high rank worthy the fine traditions of the State, and it gives me pleasure to say this here among the people of their homes.

In casting about for a theme none occurred to me which appeared more suited to the occasion than that of party government.

I trust I shall be able to discuss this in a somewhat educational way and without undue partisanism.

Why do political parties exist? What is their significance? Why do they bear the names they do? What is their history? And, above all, what are their purposes and missions?

At the outset it may be stated as a well-known fact that popular government—the rule of the people by themselves—practically always works out its major problems through the instrumentality of party. In some instances it is rather the custom for parties to form about issues as they arise. In many countries there are group systems, bloc organizations so numerous as that party responsibility is an unknown thing and legislative results are obtained only by temporary and usually ephemeral coalitions. This results in a situation where men who to-day are standing shoulder to shoulder, seeing eye to eye upon a question, may to-morrow be bitter antagonists. It is scarcely necessary to say that such governments are unable to have that fixity of purpose and stability of program essential to the highest degree of peace, public happiness, and national security.

I have read that the little Nation of Latvia, not as large territorially as the State of Indiana, has 26 political parties or groups. There are racial groups, religious blocs, economic blocs, all sorts and kinds of political divisions. This is an extreme case, to be sure, but even in France there are so many different political organizations in her parliament as that no ministry is secure overnight. In Germany there is no party with a clear majority in her Reichstag and only the powerful personality of President Von Hindenburg, coupled with a popular realization of Germany's dire necessity for harmony, makes any ministry there temporarily secure. Even in England, with all her background of ministerial tradition and conservatism, we witnessed within very recent years a coalition government with no party in power to be responsible at the bar of public opinion.

Here in our own land—and, I believe, most fortunately—we have the two-party system. To be sure the problems of government are diverse and arise in different forms. Sometimes they are constitutional, involving the interpretation and application of organic law; sometimes they are economic and fiscal; sometimes they are social and moral, and quite naturally history teems with occasions when upon many questions parties have overlapped, and almost every national campaign witnesses outbursts of dissatisfaction with the two large organizations manifesting itself in third and fourth party movements. Some of these latter two have at times reached considerable temporary proportions, but eventually all have proven sporadic and our political system continues grounded to-day, as it has been almost from the beginning, upon the two-party basis.

It must not be overlooked that neither of these two organizations has been at all times upon all questions consistent. In a recent very interesting work on "Origins of the Whig Party," Mr. Carroll, its author, says in the opening chapter:

"The names of American political parties give a superficial impression of unity that rarely exists in fact. Individual differences of opinion, sectional interests, and conflicting personal ambitions combine to make complete harmony an ideal that can only be approximated by a free use of compromises and adjustments."

We have numerous instances in Congress of Members elected as members of the one party or the other who really feel very little party responsibility. This makes life there a bit more interesting, perhaps, for those who do feel that responsibility and are trying to serve it, but if ever a majority of its members become of that mind there will be at least temporary chaos.

In California and Pennsylvania, both by custom and law, persons may seek nomination by all parties in the primaries, and many of them do and obtain them. I recall one very strong man from California who was a bitter opponent of prohibition who came to Congress, elected as the nominee of all the parties, including the primary nomination of the prohibition party itself.

It is a bit difficult for us in Tennessee to understand such a practice, and I may say in passing that such a system is almost destructive of the minority party in a State, so far as representation in Congress is concerned.

But notwithstanding the fact that there have been variations from decade to decade in the application of party principles, notwithstanding the defections and deflections occasioned by conceptions of expediency, the lure of personal ambitions to hold place and power and the yielding to gusts of apparent popular psychology, the principles themselves have been perpetual and throughout all our national existence, under the Constitution, save the major portion of Washington's two administrations, we may trace with reasonable clearness the line of party cleavage.

Another fact to be borne in mind is that it was the coming into being of the National or Federal Government which caused the formation of the parties as we have them. They did not grow primarily out of State or local problems; and I think the reason these parties have been, generally speaking, permanent in character, although changing in name, is because we have written constitutions wherein the founders sought to and did set outposts for even governmental authority and fix limitations upon the power of government itself.

One of the struggles all down the 140 years of national growth and social evolution has been to preserve the "Thou shalt nots" imbedded in the Constitution by the wise men who came out of the wilderness and laid the beams of the chambers of a Nation in which democracy—government by the governed—found its finest written plan; negations, if you please, intended to protect the individual, the single being, the sole person, in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, from even the selfishness or the caprice or the injustice of a temporarily devastating majority, to say nothing of a temporarily triumphant minority. The judicial department of the Federal Government was erected fundamentally for that specific purpose.

General Washington was not until after his retirement from the Presidency in any sense a party man. There were no definitely organized entities as political agencies whose forces were applied to or for him or which he sought to apply at either of his elections, and both of them were unanimous in the Electoral College. Whatever his dispositions may have been, they were curbed and nothing of a party nature attaches to his official life.

That this inured to the Nation's fortune we can see quite clearly, and, recognizing his virtue and wisdom, it causes no wonderment.

The new and novel experiment in government would inevitably have failed had he pursued a different course and placed himself at the head—for unavoidably this man of whom BECK says "He was always Cæsar" would have been the head—of a party organization.

That was the legislative formative period of the United States. The Constitution had been adopted, and by the third year of his first administration all the 13 original States had accepted the terms and become affiliated with the Union, while by the close of his second the three new States of Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee had been admitted upon equal terms with the older Commonwealths, but few indeed were the provisions of that Constitution that were self-executing. It was a dormant organism, which could be brought to function only by legislative and administrative action.

No President applying partisanism could have successfully met the challenge of that era or guided the new Republic out from its vicissitudes into the security in which Washington left it.

But while Washington held aloof from party movement and Vice President Adams in considerable degree emulated his example, there was no such restraint upon the two outstanding figures of his first Cabinet, and out of it there flashed—or, perhaps, it would be better to say there flamed—with steady glow the brilliancy and genius of Thomas Jefferson, the Secretary of State, and Alexander Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury.

The responsibilities of these men did not demand the restrictions which duty imposed upon Washington. Jefferson had, of necessity, as one dealing with foreign nations, to exercise a greater degree of self-control and caution than Hamilton, whose official duties were primarily domestic, but in the main neither of them suffered in their political activities very much restraint, aside from that imposed by the dictates of politeness, and at times even this was rather thinly veiled.

It was an evidence of Washington's impartial political attitude that both were invited into his official family, and both remained until, with regret in each case, he accepted their resignations because he knew them well, and he was a master at judging men. They were little alike except in genius, vision, industry, and impeccable integrity. Temperamentally they were wholly at variance—Hamilton impetuous, incisive, impatient of restraint, domineering in intellect and will; Jefferson cautious, slow to reach conclusions, apparently reluctant to make decisions, but with a subtle intellect capable of sounding the depths as well as reaching the heights of human nature and of life.

They had some interests in common, but Jefferson's were the broader in scope; Hamilton had some taste for art, sculpture, paintings, but his life's passions were politics and law. At the shrine of these he worshipped with unstinted and almost undivided devotion. He had, too, a love for and might, had opportunity offered, have displayed a genuine genius for things military—the maneuver of armed troops, the strategy and tactics of war. For this latter Jefferson had no stomach or predilection. His was a philosophy of peace—some of his critics say of timorousness.

But aside from military art, Mr. Jefferson's trained and seasoned intellect traversed the whole realm of men's activities and accomplishments and ambitions. He loved music and was a skilled violinist; agriculture interested him, and he was a constant student of plant life, of flora, and of fauna; science engaged his love, and every mechanical invention coming within his reach appealed to his attention; he cultivated refined arts, and the tobacco leaf and the corn blade designed by him for the capitals of the columns at Monticello and copied upon certain of those in the National Capitol Building at Washington are an evidence of his artistic taste and love of the beautiful.

Public education and religious freedom were controlling principles with him, and when he dictated what his epitaph should be he passed over all references to having occupied exalted official positions and directed that there be carved upon his tomb:

"Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia."

It is one of the singular events of history that Hamilton, born of obscure parentage in a little island of the West Indies, became the leader of a class and aristocratic movement, while Jefferson, born to the purple of luxury, became the greatest democratic philosopher of the ages and the undisputed leader of the great American democratic movement.

Such, however, was true, and to these two geniuses of their day may be traced, not exactly the origin perhaps, but at least the organization into cohesive entities of those schools of thought which, under different party names, for a century and a quarter have struggled for domination in the affairs of these United States.

The late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge was a devoted and intellectual disciple of Alexander Hamilton, and no one will probably be found to dispute either his right or his power to state tersely and succinctly the fundamentals of the Hamiltonian faith.

In his Alexander Hamilton, written as one of the American statesmen's series, the late Senator, after quoting from one of Hamilton's reports to Congress and declaring "the cardinal doctrines of Hamilton in questions of politics and government were strength and order," and after elaborating upon this to some extent, says:

"Hamilton's scheme went further, seeking to create a strong, and, so far as was possible and judicious, a permanent class all over the country, without regard to existing political affiliations, but bound to the Government as a government, by the strongest of all ties, immediate and personal pecuniary interest. The wisdom of this was obvious, when the object was to sustain a great experiment; yet at the same time Hamilton's purpose was not simply by the spread of a popular loan to unite a body of men in the support of the Government, but chiefly and mainly to bring to his side a class already in existence, that which controlled the capital of the country. The full intent of the policy was to array property on the side of the Government. That once done, the experiment, Hamilton felt, would succeed, and its powers moreover might then be much extended. He had been unable to introduce a class influence into the Constitution by limiting the suffrage for the President and Senate with a property qualification, but by his financial policy he could bind the existing class of wealthy men, comprising at that day the aristocracy bequeathed by provincial times to the new system, and thus, if at all, assure to the property of the country a powerful influence upon the Government."

The creed of Mr. Jefferson as stated by himself has never been improved upon for style, compactness, or lucidity, nor can it be. In his first inaugural address he condensed it within the briefest possible limit, saying:

"About to enter, fellow citizens, on the exercise of duties which comprehend everything dear and valuable to you, it is proper that you should understand what I deem the essential principles of our Government, and consequently those which ought to shape its administration. I will compress them within the narrowest compass they will bear, stating the general principle, but not all its limitations. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none; the support of State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwark against antirepublican tendencies; the preservation of the general Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the right of election by the people, a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principles of republics from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority, economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information and the arraignments of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected—these principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and the blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment. They should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civil instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety."

In these two statements we have the elemental germs of all the political principles over which men in these United States have since divided. Their vitality has never diminished, and all the issues of to-day are comprehended within their terms.

The history of the parties that have embraced these principles is most interesting and their names significant. The Hamilton organization in its very beginning was designated as the Federalist Party. It was proper nomenclature; it expressed the central thought of its leader's policy—a strongly centralized National Government, with a gradual but steady diminution of the power and prestige of the several States until local government should be reduced to a minimum and all governmental activities, whether social or economic, concentrated in the Federal organism. The complete realization of Mr. Hamilton's dearest dreams would have eventually destroyed every vestige of State sovereignty. "Federalist" was, therefore, the logical and proper name for the organization sponsoring such principles.

Jefferson gave to the organization which, with the aid of Madison, Gallatin, McClay, and others, he had by 1800 succeeded in welding into a unified and overwhelming mass the name "Republican." This, too, was in accord with the proprieties. The word married the system to the methods and machinery through which it was proposed to operate; that is, in the main through agents chosen from time to time by the electorate to legislate and execute. Its basis was representative government, with frequent opportunities for popular expression.

The Federalists, however, were unwilling to permit the opposition party to name itself, and quite early they began to designate its members as "Democrats," alleging that Mr. Jefferson and his followers drew their principles and inspiration from the promoters of the French Revolution.

Mr. Lodge, whether he intends it as a contemptuous criticism or a fair historical statement, refutes this as to Jefferson, however, when he declares that the latter did not get his ideas from France, but that he carried them with him to France. At any rate, the name "Democrat," which was at first applied in derision but which later was to be adopted and worn with pride for a century, did not gain immediate recognition and the party was for a quarter of a century officially known as "Republican."

The first victories went to Hamilton. In the formulation of domestic economic policies before parties began he had generally the sympathy and support of President Washington. The Congress during the earlier days was sitting in New York. It was then the third city in point of commercial importance, Philadelphia and Boston being, respectively, first and second. During the second Washington administration it sat at Philadelphia. Thus the Congress throughout the formative period was surrounded closely by the influences whose natural interests made them partisans of the Hamilton policy. Those were days when communication between the people and the Nation's Capital was difficult and slow of passage. Hamilton carried his proposals for debt assumption by the Federal Government at the full face value, notwithstanding the major part of the paper was in the hands of speculators who had bought it for practically nothing; his tariff policy for the stimulation of manufactures and his measure for the establishment of a national bank.

All these provoked a struggle, but they were carried, and by the time the program had been completed Hamilton had a party already organized and trained beneath his iron hand to follow with little question the suggestion of his genius—a party to his liking, "bound to the Government by the strongest of all ties—immediate and personal pecuniary interest." He never relied upon nor, except in cases of absolute necessity, appealed for popular support. Of this he was contemptuous. More than any leading man of his time he distrusted the intelligence and ability of the populace. Jefferson, on the other hand, more strongly than any leader reposed confidence in the ability of the masses to govern themselves and render popular government secure; and so, while Hamilton was going forward to victory after victory, he, more through the pens of his great lieutenants than through his own (for he wrote but little for the public until after his retirement from Washington's Cabinet), was putting into operation the forces of popular organization and democratic expression.

Hamilton never admired John Adams nor thought him properly equipped for the Presidency. In both of the latter's presidential campaigns the former preferred Pinckney and desired his selection; but even he, master of his party though he was, lacked sufficient political finesse (he was one statesman who was not a politician) to control the forces that were playing about him, and in the first, Adams triumphed, while in the second he went down to defeat before the popular onslaught which Jefferson organized and launched, and so insecure was the foundation upon which Hamilton had builded that his structure fell with the defeat of Adams and never again achieved a national success.

Jefferson and his party triumphed and the Federalist Party passed off the scene.

There followed him Madison and Monroe, faithful to his policies, and supported by Congresses in which the majorities were composed of his followers.

So intrenched had the principles of Democracy become as that by the expiration of Mr. Monroe's first term there had arisen what is known in history as the "era of good feeling," and he was reelected by unanimous vote in the electoral college, lacking one, which was withheld from him, not out of antagonism, but because the elector felt that to General Washington only should go the distinction of a unanimous election to the Presidency.

This brings us to 1824 and the contest which finally culminated in the election by the House of Representatives in 1825 of John Quincy Adams, son of the second President, and himself eminent as a scholar, diplomat, and statesman.

The party status of Mr. Adams is somewhat anomalous. He was most of the time in foreign lands, serving in diplomatic positions, while the parties were being formulated. In 1803 he was elected to the United States Senate by the Legislature of Massachusetts, the majority of whose members were Federalists, but he was not elected by a party vote and in the Senate gave support to many of President Jefferson's policies.

The support of one of these—the embargo act—led in 1808 to resolutions of criticism by the legislature, which caused him to resign. He was again returned to the Foreign Service by President Madison, and by President Monroe was made Secretary of State.

The Republican Party, which by this time was beginning to be called the Democratic-Republican, was in reality the only national organization in existence, and all the candidates of 1824, including Mr. Adams, were regarded as being of it; but here and there certain congressional districts still elected Representatives who called themselves Federalists. All the remaining Federalist strength came to Mr. Adams's support, and this, plus what he drew from the Republicans, gave him the vote of 13 States in the House of Representatives, and thus elected him, although he had received but 84 out of a total of 261 votes in the Electoral College.

ANDREW JACKSON ENTERS

It was in the good year of 1824 that a lank and angular horseman rode out of the 28-year-old Commonwealth of Tennessee, to which theretofore his political activity had been almost wholly confined, and stationed himself upon the field of national politics, which he was soon to dominate as never before or since has that field been dominated by mortal man.

His name was Andrew Jackson.

He was by no means an unknown, nor was his fame confined to any State or section or even to the wide Nation, which in 1824 had become a Union of five and twenty sovereign States.

His name was known, particularly in military circle, in all the civilized lands beyond the seas.

Madison and Monroe were placed before the people as presidential candidates by joint caucuses of the Republican (Democratic) Members of Congress held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at Washington. That was before the day of national political conventions. Gradually there grew up a popular resentment against such action. It was voiced by Henry Clay when Monroe was first nominated in 1816 in a resolution declaring it inexpedient for the caucus to make any recommendation upon the subject "to the good people of the United States." His resolution failed, however, and Monroe was recommended then, as he again was in 1820.

By 1824, however, public sentiment had so crystalized in opposition to that system as that when the caucus for that purpose was held in February of that year only about 70 out of the 216 Republican (Democratic) members attended it. William H. Crawford, of Georgia, received the indorsement, but it had ceased to be of value, and he received but 41 of the 261 electoral votes.

Jackson, from the time that he began to take any interest in the question at all, was vigorously opposed to the caucus plan, and he showed no regard or respect for its action in 1824.

In July, 1822, the Legislature of Tennessee had nominated him for President for the elections of 1824, and in 1823 he was again elected to the Senate of the United States.

Most historians seem to agree that General Jackson evinced no great interest in his candidacy of 1824; certainly there were none of those terrific efforts which attended his subsequent campaign, but he received the plurality of the popular vote and also of the Electoral College, having 99 of the 261 votes cast in the latter. His popularity had been demonstrated. He had surpassed that trio of seasoned statesmen—Adams, Crawford, and Clay—in popular appeal. It was not unnatural that a master politician such as he, though differing in type from all that had preceded him or who were his contemporaries, should have been stirred by the evident opportunity which laid before him to become the Nation's Chief Magistrate, but this might have passed, particularly in view of his enfeebled health, had it not been for an occurrence shortly after the general elections which shook the country to its uttermost bounds and made him inevitably a candidate for 1828.

No person having received a majority of the entire electoral vote, under the Constitution the decision passed to the House of Representatives, which had to choose from among the three highest, each State having one vote. Adams was elected, and a few days thereafter was inaugurated, and appointed Henry Clay as Secretary of State. The charge was immediately made that this was the result of a bargain; that Clay had thrown his influence to Adams as the result of an agreement whereby the former was to become his premier, with a view, of course, to being his successor as President, as had been the case of the former Secretaries of State.

There is no time to review that controversy thus precipitated a hundred years ago. It was one of the most momentous single incidents of American political history; it lay at the basis of a new line of political and party cleavage; it led to the duel between Clay and Randolph, of Roanoke. Clay denied the allegation and offered by his challenge to Randolph to defend this denial with his life. It changed history, and it was by no means the last quarrel of Jackson which was to have such an effect.

Jackson accepted the allegation as true and went to his grave in the unalterable belief of its truth. Most historians have acquitted Clay of the charge, but Jackson never did. Suspicion with him petrified into immediate obsession and his conviction was never shaken.

The first effect was to make him at once a candidate for 1828. He had carried the popular plurality; he was the people's choice; and they had been denied their choice, so he and his friends maintained, "by a corrupt and shameful bargain."

The Legislature of Tennessee—doubtless this time with his earnest approval and desire—in 1825 nominated him again for the election of 1828, then nearly four years in the future. He resigned from the Senate at once and entered with all the vigor of his vehement nature upon the four-year struggle.

That contest threw its shadow over the whole of John Quincy Adams's administration, it affected the attitude of Members of Congress upon every legislative movement of the time, for when Jackson fought he used every legitimate weapon upon which he could lay his hands and enlisted every man whom he could bend to his iron will. His whole appeal was to the people; he sought, as perhaps not even Jefferson ever sought, to ramify the popular thought with his cause and saturate it with a desire for vengeance and vindication. It was a titanic struggle, the forerunner of many to come. There belonged to him, as Thackeray says of Swift:

"As fierce a beak and talon as ever struck—as strong a wing as ever beat."

And the people responded; heaven bless us, how they did respond! Do not for one moment become obsessed with the idea that this was a mere uprising, as of a mob. Under the banner of this mighty militant there had enlisted as fine intelligence and as excellent probity as ever lent themselves to a cause—men who were themselves leaders of men, all thrilling with the impulse of their chieftain, all inspired by the flash of those penetrating eyes, whose sparks flew out for the pale, lean, classic face which was as if chiseled from granite.

He became the embodiment of democracy; its "cloud by day and its pillar of fire by night." His lieutenants in every section of the Republic organized popular sentiment and gave it intelligent direction. They marched with pride behind a leader who knew how to lead and had the purpose and the will. The name "Republican" was dropped by his followers and proudly they called themselves "Democrats," as their predecessors in the days of Jefferson had been designated in derision and in scorn.

His triumph was complete, overwhelming; and a few days before his sixty-second birthday he was sworn in as President of the United States by the venerable Chief Justice John Marshall, the last great link connecting the long-dead Federalist organization with the eager and victorious Democracy.

I must not, out of deference to your patience, attempt now any detailed résumé of his administrations and their achievements. Almost all that was accomplished was the product of ceaseless struggle and embittered contest.

The history of the break with Calhoun and its effects is important enough briefly to sketch it. It was politics—great politics—in the raw. It was a mighty drama in which we see the play of human passion, sometimes at its best, sometimes at lower levels.

Toward the latter part of his first administration Jackson was placed in possession of a letter stating that while he was engaged in the Seminole military campaign, Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Monroe, had, in a Cabinet meeting, urged censure upon Jackson for his conduct, alleging that he had exceeded his authority. Jackson had had some intimation years before that such a proposition had been made, but he believed it came from Crawford, Monroe's Secretary of the Treasury. He was strengthened in this belief by criticisms which Crawford, joining Clay, had made in the open Senate. The information that it was Calhoun, who, up to then, notwithstanding Jackson's love for Van Buren, had been his political favorite, came as a terrible blow. It aroused all the fire and fury of his well-nigh unrestrainable nature. He sent the letter to Calhoun, without any publicity being given it, and asked a direct response.

Calhoun admitted it and attempted to explain, but no explanation could satisfy the enraged man, who felt that his honor was deeply touched. After many months the correspondence was made public, and all relations between them ceased. Jackson had added to Clay and other enemies another of the most brilliant and incisive intellects of that or any other age.

It destroyed all hope of Calhoun succeeding him in the Presidency; it brought about the rejection of Van Buren by the Senate—the Vice President casting the deciding vote against him—as minister to England, to which he had been given a recess appointment, and he had to return in semidisgrace, only to be nominated, under Jackson's compulsion, in 1832 for Vice President and elected to preside over the body which had so recently humiliated him. It doubtless had something to do with Calhoun's resignation from the Vice Presidency in December, 1832, to enter the Senate from South Carolina, where he took upon himself the defense of nullification by a State of Federal law, a challenge which Jackson first answered with the famous toast at the noted banquet, "The Federal Union—it must be preserved," and later by lengthy proclamation and the actual assembling of armed forces of the Government.

Clay in the meantime had reentered the Senate. Webster had been there during all of Jackson's administration and before, and then occurred one of those strange incidents of history. The three of them, moved in part by impulses of personal feeling and in part by points of difference with the President, although themselves disagreed upon many matters and at times maintaining no personal relations, formed a coalition against Jackson and stood forth as the great triumvirate. There is no evidence that Webster hated Jackson. He supported him most vigorously in his fight upon nullification, but he loved the bank and was prepared to go the limit in traffic and sacrifice to assure the continuance of its life. The two others not only disagreed with Jackson upon many public questions but they hated him personally. If they did not hate him as much as he despised them, it was simply because of a lack of capacity for hating. The will was there.

No stronger intellectual combination was ever formed against a man or a cause in the world, but he triumphed.

It was with complete content and entire satisfaction that he turned from the White House on March 4, 1837, after witnessing the installation of his successor, whom he himself had named, and, leaving his enemies crushed behind him, made his triumphant journey to the Hermitage, and sat himself down by his window, which looked out over the garden where Rachel slept under the springtime flowers.

If one may be called upon to sum up Jackson in a few words and interpret him to mankind, I think it may be done by saying that he was democracy incarnate, plus the purpose, the will, and the power to enforce its decrees. He could not have been a Jefferson any more than Jefferson could have been a Jackson, but he would have been Jackson had Jefferson never lived. Democracy was not to him an abstract art or an abstruse science. It was a virile system to be applied to the needs, the evolution, and the developments of society. He grasped by intuition what so many have not learned at all, or only learned by painful processes of study and labor; and what he believed he put into action; his faith was made to function in living law.

Great as the party system which he had builded, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say rebuilded, and compactly as he had welded it together, with his personality removed it began to weaken. He was followed in the Presidency and leadership of his party during the pre-Civil War period by men who are entitled to the designation of great, but somehow no one of them could quite "bend the bow of Ulysses."

Within four years after his retirement he witnessed, with what mingled disgust and humiliation we can well imagine, the defeat of the great party which he had left so strong.

It is rather difficult to account for the triumph of Harrison in 1840. He was the first of two Whig Presidents, Zachary Taylor being the other, both of whom died in office, to be elected. Both had achieved military distinction and this may have tipped the scales in their favor.

The Whig Party sprang up during Jackson's day and took its name from the English organization which had been formed in opposition to the crown. It was a misnomer so far as America was concerned, and it would seem as if Clay and Webster, with all their talents, might have thought of a better. They were unwilling, it seems, to revive the name "Republican," so closely associated with Jefferson, as was done in 1854, when slavery was becoming the one great issue, and so they took the name of Whig because, as they said, they opposed the tyranny of Jackson as the English party opposed the tyranny of the King.

The unconscious irony was clearly to be seen when it is remembered that Jackson relied always and absolutely upon popular support, not only for election, but for the indorsements and sustaining of his policies.

This was no demagogy with him; it was sacred to him as an article of faith.

The Whig Party embraced the principles of Hamilton and thus became the lineal descendant of the Federalist organization, but notwithstanding their successes of 1840 and 1848 they were never able to apply their principles. Tyler, who succeeded Harrison upon his death, disappointed them upon the bank question, and no serious effort was ever thereafter made to revive this institution in the Hamiltonian form. As a matter of fact, but little of Jackson's work was undone until after the war of secession.

In 1844 his party retrieved its prestige in part, and his friend and protégé, James K. Polk, was elected President.

The old warrior saw no other presidential contest, for on the 8th of June, 1845, his spirit joined the spirit of Rachel, and his body was laid beside her in the garden where the flowers were abloom.

Following the defeat of 1852 and with the passing of Webster and Clay the Whig Party almost immediately died. The Federalist Party had just one term of the Presidency and died after one defeat; its first successor had two terms and died after two defeats.

Following its death there was organized as the opposition party the one which exists to-day under the name of Republican. This was taken for a number of reasons. Many then survived who had followed the old party of Jefferson to victory under that name, and, above all, Jefferson had been the sworn and earnest foe of slavery, and this was the sole question about which the founders proposed to build the new movement.

The national platforms of that party in 1856 and 1860 contain reference to little save this. Lincoln was not one of the founders of the Republican Party. He joined it after it had been thoroughly organized and was a "going concern" in 1856, and became its infinitely greatest leader, but that leadership was along the lines and within the limitations of the platform which dealt only with slavery.

We know but little of Lincoln's economic ideas. There are fugitive utterances to be found here and there, to be sure, but these are not sufficiently comprehensive to enable us to reconstruct any general system to which he adhered. His public life was comparatively brief, so far as holding office was concerned. He was in national position for little more than six years, one term as a Representative in Congress and four years and a month as President. He was a member of the Whig Party, to be sure, and an admirer of Henry Clay; but, so far as his own utterances were concerned, we have little from which to deduce the bent of his mind upon economics.

That party was founded upon an idealism of which Lincoln was the incarnation. It was inevitable that the results of the war of secession should give to it a long lease of power. The Democratic Party became associated in public thought almost exclusively with the doctrine of State rights, and the expression "State rights" for a generation, almost, brought to millions of persons, as the initial thought, secession, war, a land billowed with graves, and a country filled with homes wherein sat mothers who were "weeping for their children and would not be comforted." The popular psychology produced by such a situation was inevitable. In the platform of 1864 the same "Republican" was not used by the convention which nominated Lincoln and Johnson, but the body was composed principally of that party's members, and the organization, the party machinery, was in their hands. It was in existence, and there needed only to be fused into it the elements for which the war success opened the way to render it for a long time practically invincible. Wise and far-seeing interests grasped this fact and, seizing upon the party of Abraham Lincoln, they engrafted upon it, in so far as they could, the old policies of Federalism, which have been with us from the beginning, and made it the party of Alexander Hamilton.

Such is an outline of party history—rather imperfect, perhaps, but believed to be essentially correct and fairly stated. In the conditions of to-day are to be found, in principle, all the issues that marked the early years of the Republic.

Honest convictions continue to flourish devoted to each school of thought, and upon careful analysis I believe that every major question can be resolved into one or the other classes. In other words, I believe there are just two great schools of political thought between which most of our people are normally divided, and I further adhere to the belief that two parties are all that we need. After all, the party is not the end; it is the instrumentality for working the end. We are sure to have party government of some type. I prefer the system with which we are familiar rather than one of groups and blocs. Party government means party responsibility; government by a coalition of divergent groups formed about some especial conviction or temporary prejudice, each with its own pet hobby, means there is no one organization responsible to public opinion; no majority to be used as an agency for working the public will. What we need most is to get away from so much political expediency and plant ourselves upon the principles which underlie our respective party faiths.

In conclusion, I shall venture to speak just a bit more particularly of our own party and with special reference to present conditions.

Democracy is not a state of mind nor a psychological manifestation. It is a fundamental thing which lies deep in the human heart, and in its essence is of the profoundest philosophy of human life.

It does not spring from government; it underlies government, at least our Government.

Simply because man exists he is possessed of certain rights. They are coexistent with his birth and coextensive with his being. Government is merely to assure these rights, and the highest functioning of government is that activity, or lack of activity, as necessity dictates, which preserves them.

Democracy is the antithesis of selfishness, and its constant danger is that it become the victim of greed. Because of its very nature it is surrounded always with enemies, enemies that are astute, alert, constantly organized, and ever watchful.

Because its character renders it unable to offer favors of law and enable one individual through legislative manipulation to profit at the expense of another, it does not, as an instrument of government, command the influence or elicit the support of special interests. It has to rely upon reason, upon justice, and make its appeal to the higher motives and the broader sympathies of mankind, and, unfortunately, these are not always in the ascendancy.

These enemies, watchful and adroit, are masters of political warfare. Tactics, strategics, logistics—they possess them all, and never yet have they been found lacking in munitions.

They understand frontal attack and flank movement; when to strike and when to give the counterstroke. The value of espionage they recognized long ago, and above all things they appreciate the importance of creating dissentions and divisions in Democracy's forces, and we are all too prone to divide.

In 1924, although they had no heavy artillery with which to bombard us, we nevertheless broke ranks before we had gotten close enough for them to see the whites of our eyes.

Is it possible, I wonder, that a great party, grounded in traditions of glory, a great party which has written nearly every permanent chapter of American law, is again to fall a victim to its own folly and blither about nonessentials, fight with passionate abandon over imaginary goblins and academic abstractions, and forget the substance which challenges our bravest and our best? Heaven forbid!

Surely in the conditions which surround us and which are observable upon the very surface, without even probing to the depths, we have glaring issues upon which to make successful appeal to the intelligence and virtue of America. In the favoritism which within seven short years has been wrought into law; in the tangled confusion following in the wake of corruption and shame; in the foreign policy, or lack of foreign policy, which has left us without a friend among the nations of the world; in the domestic distresses which all their cunning has not enabled them to cure because avarice forbade alleviation—surely these things summon us to find a firm and common ground upon which the legions of Democracy can stand and give lusty battle as in the victorious days of yore.

Democracy will not win grouped about a jumble of policies asserted as meeting the expediency of a fleeting hour. Democracy has won its fights when it had a battle flag which symbolized a system of principles fitted for the government of a free people in a republic (which is a democracy made practical) grounded upon a written constitution.

Democracy will never be destroyed; its philosophy too thoroughly permeates the world. And the party which espouses it stands in no danger of death from external forces. Its only danger lies within its own organism. It will not be killed, but it could commit suicide.

Democracy means respect for law and the implications of law; regard for the Constitution and the limitations of the Constitution; antagonism to governmental favoritism and the corrupting force of favoritism; enmity to privilege and the withering blight of privilege upon our institutions.

It means justice to the individual and, therefore, peace among the masses.

The application of its principles by some party constitutes the sole hope for the permanency of this democratic Republic.

Surely the Democratc Party—our Democratic Party—ought to be the one to apply democratic principles.

Its founder made it the instrumentality which rendered the Republic a democratic one.

Andrew Jackson revived it as it was about to become moribund and expanded it even beyond the hopes of its founder.

A long line of leaders, whose names are on the roll of immortals, have followed these and carried on, applying the principles of democracy to the solution of the Nation's vital questions.

Surely we of this demanding day will also carry on.

W. L. CLAYTON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Associated Press of February 16 carries a statement to the effect that W. L. Clayton, of the firm of Anderson, Clayton & Co., has charged me with abusing my congressional privileges by making statements on the floor of the House which he says are untrue. I have not made a statement with reference to this matter that can not be amply substantiated by proof.

The principal charge which he denounces as false was to the effect that he said in a speech before members of the New York Cotton Exchange that firms other than his own could not hope to avoid loss in the cotton business unless they could successfully guess his mind. I said in my speech to which he refers that Mr. Clayton was quoted as having made this statement, and he comes out and not only denies it but takes occasion to denounce me for calling the country's attention to it. Let us see whether he made that statement or not.

I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. S. T. Hubbard, sr., dean of the cotton industry in New York and former president of the New York Cotton Exchange, whose son is president of the exchange now, in which he says:

268 PALISADE AVENUE, YONKERS-ON-HUDSON, N. Y.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have not seen your speech in the House on Monday, though I have heard of it. To-day my eye was attracted to the inclosed statement given in the New York Times. I have known Mr. Clayton for many years. I have a very high opinion of him as a man and his ability as a cotton merchant. We do not always agree in our opinions, but when we differ it is without any feeling.

Cotton merchants soon learn that their opinions may be right or they may be wrong, so when they disagree their opinions are subject to the course of events and are not decided on any personal weight of opinion.

Mr. Clayton, however, has had a lapse of memory. He did make that statement. I heard it. I took it for part of my text, as I followed him in a speech to the assembled members of the exchange. I repeated it several times in my speech and he heard me repeat it. Mine was the last speech. I believe what I said and what he said turned the opinion of the members against him.

When the ballots on the amendments we were discussing were counted at the date set for voting we came within a very few votes of carrying by a two-thirds vote, as required by the by-laws. Mr. Clayton's statement has been quoted many, many times by the members who heard it. No stenographic notes were taken of any of the speeches—by direction of Mr. Harris, then presiding as president—although the exchange stenographer, Miss Wilson, was present.

After the meeting I said to many members that Mr. Clayton's remarks had defeated him, and I went so far as to say I thought in time that he would give a million dollars not to have made them.

I am also reliably informed that possibly 200 men will make affidavit that they heard Mr. Clayton make that statement.

I am not interested personally in Mr. Clayton, but I am interested in breaking up this gigantic monopoly in which certain large cotton firms have successfully conspired to control the cotton market, ruining the cotton farmers, and wrecking the fortunes of hundreds of men legitimately engaged in the cotton trade. [Applause.]

An investigation has been ordered by a Senate committee in which Anderson, Clayton & Co., George H. McFadden & Co., Pennefather & Co., and all other persons, firms, or corporations charged with complicity in this gigantic conspiracy may be required to give a full and thorough account of their transactions with reference to this unfortunate affair.

I stated in my speech a few days ago that under the Sherman Antitrust Act those who have lost money as the result of these unlawful manipulations of the cotton market may bring suit and recover their losses. My attention has been called to the fact that they may not only sue for the amount lost but may recover three times the amount of the actual damages.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up further time of the House on this proposition. The indications are now that new charges and new evidence may be brought to light within the next few days that will far overshadow the revelations already made and the charges already preferred. [Applause.]

CORRECTIONS

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have some corrections to make in the RECORD, only two of which I want to make from the floor. One, where in speaking of the Flathead Tribe of Indians, I am quoted as saying "the House is not totally informed," I should have said "the House is not totally uninformed."

Then, a subhead that I wrote, "Where is the denaturant that is harmless but effective," appears in the speech of the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the corrections will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] that the gentleman from Iowa may again suggest a method in which the RECORD can be corrected in a simpler way.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me say to the gentleman that my custom is to follow the course suggested by the gentleman from Iowa as to the bulk of the corrections, but there are times when it is only fair to other Members and to the Member himself to have the correction made in this public way. One of these corrections covers an error that might have caused embarrassment to the gentleman from Maryland without it appearing in the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I have no objection to the correction, but I do not like to have one Member's attention called to the matter and another Member make corrections without having his attention called to it.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think that the dividing line should be whether or not the correction if made would place the other Member engaged in the colloquy in an unfavorable light?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. One of these corrections was merely adding a syllable to a word, "uninformed" for "informed."

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; but it so happens that that little syllable was of importance. It was in an answer I was making in response to an attack that claimed that the House was uninformed. It was possibly through my own error.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I was engaged on another important matter and did not hear the request, but the practice of the House is very well known, that minor corrections can be made and are made every day without taking up the time of the House by unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in my remarks on February 10 the words "Department of Labor" are used and they should be "Labor Bureau, Incorporated." I ask unanimous consent that this may be changed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, this is another very clear example where the correction could be made by handing it to any one of the reporters, and it would appear corrected in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. CANFIELD. For the information of the gentleman I will say that I have been misquoted on this, and I ask that this correction be made to keep the RECORD straight, as it was the "Labor Bureau, Incorporated," that gave out the information referred to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman mean to say that he has been misquoted by the press?

Mr. CANFIELD. I do not think the press misquoted me, but I have heard of it from other channels.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not here to object to these requests. The only object I have in reserving the right to object was to call to the attention of the Members the rule that govern corrections of this kind, and to impress upon them the fact that they can be corrected with the RECORD clerk, or that the correction can be made by calling it to the attention of any one of the reporters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS

The SPEAKER. To fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Representative William N. Vaile, of Colorado, the Chair appoints on the Joint Committee on Northern Pacific Land Grants the gentleman from Utah, Hon. DON B. COLTON.

SUSPENSIONS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be agreeable to the Speaker to inform the House whether there will be any suspensions to-day, and what they will be, so that we may be prepared for them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always glad to inform any gentleman with respect to that. So far as the Chair is at present advised, he will recognize two motions to suspend the rules to-day, one in respect to the pension bill and the other for the extension of time with respect to soldiers' bonus. So far as the Chair is informed, that will be all.

Under the order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] for 15 minutes.

PROHIBITING THE EXPORTATION OF ARMS, ETC., TO BELLIGERENT NATIONS

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, my purpose is to draw attention to a measure soon to be taken up for consideration by the House. It is a joint resolution, unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and as it is brief, I ask permission to append it to my remarks. The resolution declares in favor of the general policy of prohibiting the exportation to any nation at war with another nation of arms, munitions, or implements of war. The policy as declared is not applicable to a condition of civil war within a nation, but to a war between or among nations.

As the intention is to prevent any American citizen or interest from aiding or abetting a belligerent by directly or indirectly supplying it the articles in question, I can see that it would be wise to amend the resolution by going beyond the use of the mere term "exportation," so as to set forth the intent more definitely and deal more effectively with the evil which is designed to be remedied. I feel confident that to this end the committee will offer a perfecting amendment.

Whenever foreign nations embark in war the President issues a proclamation announcing that our Government will stand neutral. There is no statute requiring this, but it is done in accordance with the practice initiated at the beginning and which no President would now think of disregarding. The resolution provides that upon such a proclamation being made it shall forthwith be unlawful to export or attempt to export from this country to any belligerent the materials or implements of war specified in the resolution. A violation of the prohibition is made punishable by both fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Of course, Congress would retain authority to remove the ban generally or in any particular instance, without any expression to that effect, but it was thought wise to advertise to the world, in some quarters of which our system is not understood, that Congress possesses such authority, and conceivably might exercise it in some appropriate case.

The committee spared no effort to enumerate carefully and exhaustively the things which are forbidden to be exported. In the enumeration is the list of articles some time ago formulated at Geneva, and to that list are added tanks and armored cars, aircraft meant for warfare, poisonous gases and acids, and there is an inclusive reference to any other articles or inventions prepared for use in warfare.

Our Government and people earnestly wish to do whatever is possible to make an end of war and, short of that, to minimize its scope and activities. Nevertheless, we regretfully confess that since the armistice was signed much less of a practical nature has been accomplished in that direction than is universally desired. The resolution proceeds on the theory that whatever may be the attitude of other nations in respect to the desirability of a more peaceful world, a plain duty attaches to our own undeniable attitude. In its spirit it is antagonistic to war as a legitimate method of setting international disputes, and on the contrary it breathes the very spirit of peace. It does not stop with the employment of words voicing a belief and hope, but in at least one broad field of opportunity it concretely substitutes the obligation to discourage war in the place of continuing a right of traffic which inevitably encourages and supports war. To that extent, it really outlaws war. It construes the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" so as to pledge ourselves not to assist the inhabitants of one nation in the business of killing the inhabitants of another nation. It is not designed to make any American his brother's keeper, but it is designed to prevent him from being an accessory to his brother's injury or murder.

I should not omit to say that the principle of the resolution had its origin with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. On the first day of the present session Mr. BURTON offered a resolution providing against the exportation of the instrumentalities of war to any aggressor nation making war on another nation in violation of its treaty obligations. To this there were two objections: First, that it is often difficult to determine which of two nations is really the aggressor; and, second, that it is sometimes difficult to determine whether treaty obligations have been violated. Furthermore, the committee, after much deliberation, were convinced that a full step should be taken instead of a partial and uncertain step, and so the resolution was framed free of the limitation originally attached.

There is a powerful argument in favor of the proposal deducible from our own history and the provisions of existing statutes. Neutrality is the most progressive branch of international law, but the progress was not swift or sure until this Government was founded. It was the action of our Government in its earliest days which established, or, if not that, courageously defined and enforced the doctrine that a nation should remain neutral toward nations at war with each other. The service rendered the world by Washington in applying that doctrine is one of his many great contributions to the welfare of mankind and throughout the subsequent period there has been steady adherence by this Nation to the principle of neutrality. That principle will be logically and wisely extended by the enactment of this resolution. But there is something else: During that period statutes have been passed and are now in effect extending the doctrine of Government neutrality to our citizens within a certain sphere of action. These statutes, which need not be detailed, forbid citizens under heavy penalties to enter the war service of a foreign nation with which we are at peace; to fit out expeditions in this country for participation or assisting in carrying on war against a nation with which we are at peace, and from furnishing equipment to the naval vessels of a belligerent nation entering any of our ports. These statutes command our citizens to observe a measure of neutrality. What we are now asking is that their complete neutrality shall be insured. We ask for a statute to penalize the exportation from this country and the intention is to penalize the sale in this country for the direct and indirect use of a belligerent of the primary means of warfare. Under the operation of the law whose enactment is asked, the United States would hereafter cease to be a reservoir from which belligerent nations might obtain a supply of the agencies of bloodshed and destruction. No one disapproves the Government itself standing neutral. No one disapproves compelling the citizens to be neutral to the extent provided by the statutes mentioned. That being the situation, how can anyone reasonably combat the proposition that neutrality to the extent contemplated by this resolution, should be enjoined on the citizen?

Should it be argued that the proposal is a radical departure from the prevailing practice in the Old World, as well as here, the reply is that war has taken on a more serious aspect because of its increasingly destructive character and that any expedient is justified, even though it may be considered radical, which gives any promise of preventing or diminishing the evils of war.

Should it be argued that to stop the traffic in the manner proposed might lead the nations of the Old World, recognizing their inability to obtain war supplies here, to incur more expense in accumulating them for use in case of need, the reply is that what they may do in that direction is their own business, and an additional reply is that it is more probable, since no belligerent will be able to look to this country for assistance in carrying on war, that the law would result in greater exertion being made by the nations across the sea to reduce expenditures in preparing for war by the limitation of armaments and otherwise.

Should it be argued that to stop the traffic in the manner proposed might slow down the manufacture of war material necessary for our own use in the event of being brought into war, the reply is that the most competent and wealthy nation on earth is not entitled to depend on keeping itself prepared by facilitating in times of peace the destruction of people who for some reason have been doomed to suffer the horrors of armed conflict. The manufacture of war supplies in the United States is not an infant industry requiring protection at the expense of unfortunate people of other nations. And it certainly does not deserve protection for the purpose of any person or group being enabled to profit from a traffic which can not be thought of otherwise than as the most sordid species of homicide—homicide for a money consideration.

Should it be argued that if the law is enacted and then in some instance Congress, in order to save a weak nation from cruel injustice, or possibly in order to safeguard the interests of this country, should lift the embargo in its application to some belligerent, our Government might be charged with practically waging war against the adversary belligerent, the reply is that we are strong enough to risk any such possibility, and that we must not forever take counsel of our apprehension and fears if we are to exert ourselves effectively for the promotion of peace.

Long ago a question was asked about priority in the matter of individual greatness, and the answer was: "Whosoever will be the chief among you, let him be the servant of all." This conception is as true of nations as of individuals. It is the ability and willingness of our Nation to serve which marks its greatness. The measure which I have discussed can work no detriment to our own interests, but by its enactment we can perform our duty of rendering some service to humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does this resolution referred to by the gentleman from Virginia prohibit the importation of these same articles into this country by neutrals?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No; it does not.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think it ought to, in order to be consistent.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Personally I would have no objection to that at all, though I do not think it of practical consequences because it would be very rarely the case that any importations would be desired.

Mr. DENISON. If our country should get into war with some other nation, the tendency would be for neutrals to want to send their war supplies to our country. If by law we are going to prohibit our citizens from selling war supplies in other countries, ought we not also to prohibit the citizens of other countries from selling war supplies in our country?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think the gentleman's suggestion is well worth consideration. I think we should put the bars up just as far as possible against traffic that makes for the promotion of war.

Mr. DENISON. We at least ought to impose the same prohibition on the citizens of other countries that we seek to impose upon the citizens of our own country.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. So far as we can reach the citizens of other countries, or reach the citizens of this country.

Mr. DENISON. We can reach the citizens of other countries by prohibiting the import as well as the export.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We can. It is a point which deserves to be thought about.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

H. J. Res. 183, Seventieth Congress, first session, Report No. 492

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1928.

Mr. BURTON introduced the following joint resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed. January 30, 1928, referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war to belligerent nations

Resolved, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States of America to prohibit the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war to any nation which is engaged in war with another.

SEC. 2. Whenever the President recognizes the existence of war between foreign nations by making proclamation of the neutrality of the United States, it shall be unlawful, except by the consent of the Congress, to export or attempt to export any arms, munitions, or implements of war from any place in the United States or any possession thereof, to the territory of either belligerent or to any place if the ultimate destination of such arms, munitions, or implements of war is within the territory of either belligerent or any military or naval force of either belligerent.

SEC. 3. As used in this joint resolution the term "arms, munitions, or implements of war" means—

1. Rifles, muskets, carbines.

2. (a) Machine guns, automatic rifles, and machine pistols of all calibers; (b) mountings for machine guns; (c) interrupter gears.

3. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in Nos. 1 and 2 above.

4. Gun-sighting apparatus, including aerial gun sights and bomb sights, and fire-control apparatus.

5. (a) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a caliber less than 5⅞ inches (15 centimeters); (b) cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a caliber of 5⅞ inches (15 centimeters) or above; (c) mortars of all kinds; (d) gun carriages, mountings, recuperators, accessories for mountings.

6. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in No. 5 above.

7. Apparatus for the discharge of bombs, torpedoes, depth charges, and other kinds of projectiles.

8. (a) Grenades; (b) bombs; (c) land mines, submarine mines, fixed or floating; depth charges; (d) torpedoes.

9. Appliances for use with the above arms and apparatus.

10. Bayonets.

11. Tanks and armored cars; aircraft designed for purposes of warfare.

12. Arms and ammunition not specified in the above enumeration prepared for use in warfare.

13. Poisonous gases, acids, or any other articles or inventions prepared for use in warfare.

14. Component parts of the articles enumerated above if capable of being used in the assembly or repair of the said articles or as spare parts.

SEC. 4. Whoever exports or attempts to export any arms, munitions, or implements of war in violation of the provisions of this resolution shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report any such violation of the provisions of this resolution to the United States district attorney for the district wherein the violation is alleged to have been committed.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN ALASKA

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9031) to provide further for the disposal of abandoned military reservations in the Territory of Alaska, including Signal Corps stations and rights of way.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any lands included within the limits of abandoned or useless military reservations, including Signal Corps stations or rights of way, and not otherwise withdrawn or used for a public purpose, in the Territory of Alaska, have been or may be placed hereafter by order of the President under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior for disposition, the Secretary may proceed to cause the survey, appraisal, and disposition of such lands or any portions thereof in the manner provided by the act of July 5, 1884 (23 Stat. L. 103), or the Secretary may, in his discretion, direct the restoration of such lands or any portions thereof to disposition under the public land laws applicable to the Territory of Alaska: Provided, That any person locating, entering, or acquiring title to any such lands shall, in addition to the regular fees, commissions, and purchase price of the land, pay the appraised price of any improvements placed thereon by the Government.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for administering the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HOSPITAL AT DAYTON SOLDIERS' HOME

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 132) authorizing the erection of a sanitary fireproof hospital at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Dayton, Ohio.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand at the last time this calendar was called gentlemen in charge of this bill were waiting to get some statement from the authorities. Until that information is received I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection until the author of the bill has opportunity to make a statement later in the day?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. SPEAKS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that further consideration of this bill go over until a little later in the day, when the author of the bill is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over until later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 325) repealing existing law requiring the Postmaster General to report action taken on claims of postmasters.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9200) to provide for the appointment of three additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, with the one following, namely, H. R. 5774, may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BLANTON. Then just one objection will take them off, but if it is objected to now it will require three.

Mr. DYER. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that there has been some arrangement between the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and one of his colleagues in New York.

Mr. BLANTON. It can be put back on the calendar under the general rule.

Mr. DYER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PAY TO DEPENDENT RELATIVES OF NURSES OF THE REGULAR ARMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relatives of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct," approved December 17, 1919, so as to include nurses of the Regular Army.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved December 17, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 367), entitled "An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct," shall apply to nurses of the Regular Army to the same extent and under the same conditions as to officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be ordered engrossed and read a third time and passed.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I thought it was generally understood that gentlemen who had bills involving citations of statutes would offer amendments to show in parenthesis in what part of the code such act proposed to be amended could be found.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the gentleman that I did not hear of any such suggestion or understanding. The report has been filed for some time on this bill, and I am not prepared to give the code reference.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not intend to object, although I am trying to impress gentlemen here, as I did the other day, with the importance of having that reference made in order that people who read these amendments will know in what section of the code they will fall.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to suggest that it is very desirable to have these references, but it seems to me the only way we can get them is to devise some method by which some clerk can be employed to go through these bills and have these references ready, so that they may be proposed as amendments, when bills come up. Members of the House have told me that they have a great deal of difficulty in finding statutes in the code. There is no available index, as I am informed, through which cross references can be made.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman was not present, I think, a few days ago when I called attention of Members to a very complete index.

I then called attention to the fact that we have a very complete index in the legislative service of the Library of Congress, which was prepared by and is in charge of Mr. W. H. McLennan, who rendered valuable service in codifying the laws as they appear in the United States code. He tells me that he has card indexes showing where every act of Congress in existence prior to December 7, 1925, can be found in the United States Code of Laws, and if gentlemen want to know where the acts they are seeking to amend can be found, all they have to do is to call up Mr. McLennan and he will be glad to give them references to the code.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me say this: I heard the gentleman's remarks upon that subject and I find that there is only one copy of that index in existence, the one that is held by the legislative service. Of course, it is quite inconvenient for Members to go there to obtain their information. What the gentleman suggests should be done, and I am trying to suggest a way in which it might be done. However, instead of expecting Members of the House to secure that information themselves, I think it would be well if some one could arrange to have the information here when the Consent Calendar is called.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Just this further suggestion: I have not objected to a single bill on this ground, and I am not going to object now, but the observation made by the gentleman from Illinois, that we should have a clerk look after this, suggests the idea that possibly we should have additional help in our legislative drafting service to assist Members in finding these references.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That would be the place to have it done.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has suggested two means of getting this information. Both of them are good, so why go further. The office of our legislative counsel has been extended and enlarged time and again and they are the most accommodating men you ever saw. If any Member will take his bill there they will tell him in a short time what the reference should be, so why discuss this question on the floor every time the Consent Calendar comes up?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The reason for it is that there still appear to be some Members who do not know that we are trying to have references to the code inserted in these bills which amend statutes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has suggested two means whereby we can get the information.

Mr. McSWAIN. This report was prepared some time ago and before the gentleman's suggestion had been made. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion and I commend him for it. However, we did not think it would be well to reprint the report and as far as I am concerned I have my hands full of other things.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to have the gentleman's advice on this proposition: A bill has just been passed which I introduced at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, the first bill on to-day's calendar. It refers to the act of July 5, 1884. I endeavored to locate that in the code and I found it was in title 43, chapter 26. In referring to that act I would have to say title 43, chapter 26, sections 1071, 1072, 1073, and 1074, because there are acts of a later date in that same chapter, and I thought I would be safe in doing that; but I looked toward the end of that title and I was perplexed, because I found a later section that in some way tied in three preceeding sections passed at a later date than the act of 1884. Therefore I am at a loss to know how to refer to them.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I realize there are some diffifficulties; but if the gentleman had followed the remarks I made the other day, he would know that I tried to point out a way making it perfectly safe to refer only to the code in amending statutes. When you can not find a reference to the code or where there is a situation such as the gentleman calls attention to, presenting insurmountable difficulties, of course, you may have to stick to the old method.

Mr. SINNOTT. I thought it might be solved in this way: Not referring to the section at all but referring to the title and chapter, although there are other laws in that same title.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That would help and I admit would be better than nothing. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CARLISLE BARRACKS RESERVATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5635) to amend the act approved June 7, 1924, authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Carlisle Barracks Reservation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the bill is drawn in such a way as to make me a little uncertain.

Mr. McSWAIN. It is really to authorize a purchase.

Mr. CRAMTON. Have they that authority now, or does this constitute an appropriation? The report is not full enough to let one know what the present authority is.

Mr. McSWAIN. The original act which is referred to here—the act of June 7, 1924—authorized the sale of two parcels of land it was intended to purchase.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me ask this: They are now authorized to sell certain land. Are they authorized to use the proceeds of that sale in buying any other land?

Mr. McSWAIN. Exactly.

Mr. CRAMTON. They are authorized to use those proceeds?

Mr. McSWAIN. Exactly.

Mr. CRAMTON. If they are already authorized to use those proceeds, I am not going to object to this authority.

Mr. McSWAIN. This act is necessary because the original authorization provided for the purchase of two tracts. When they went to buy and proceeded to condemn they found that the price fixed by the condemnation jury for one tract was more than double the sum available, so they abandoned the purchase of one tract and are now purchasing the other tract, which is the more desirable at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved June 7, 1924, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of Carlisle Barracks Reservation" (43 Stat. L. 657), is hereby amended by revoking the authority in that act to purchase the Henderson tract of land and to authorize the proceeds derived from the sale of part of the tract known as farm No. 2, authorized to be sold by said act, to be applied to the purchase of the so-called Alexander tract of land adjacent to Carlisle Barracks Reservation and authorized to be purchased by said act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FORT BELKNAP RESERVATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9994) to reimburse certain Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation, Mont., for part or full value of an allotment of land to which they were individually entitled.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, from any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45,716.80 to reimburse the following-named Indians or their heirs, if deceased, in the amounts following their respective names as full compensation for the value of an allotment of land on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation, Mont., to which they were individually entitled under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. p. 1355): Richard O'Bryan, $1,516.80; Bessie O'Bryan Dohmeyer, $3,400; Eva O'Bryan, $3,400; Kate O'Bryan Wernicke, $3,400; Gerald O'Bryan, $200; Barbara E. O'Bryan, $200; John F. O'Bryan, $3,400; Rose Ellen O'Bryan, $3,400; Archie DuBoise, $1,600; Henry Bradley, $1,000; George Bradley, $1,600; William Bradley, $1,600; Josephine First Raised, $1,600; Mary First Raised, $1,600; Bryan First Raised, $800; Elizabeth Parker, $3,400; Charles W. Parker, $3,400; Ambrose Parker, $3,400; Darlene E. Parker, $3,400; Adell Strike, $200; Rosella O'Bryan, $1,600; Daisy Adams, $1,600: Provided, That the funds authorized to be appropriated hereby shall remain under the control of the Secretary of the Interior and may be paid to the Indians in cash or expended, in his discretion, in the purchase of inherited or other trust lands within the Fort Belknap Reservation for which patents shall be issued of the same form as those held by other Indians of the reservation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to strike out certain language. I understand the amendment is agreeable to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 2, in line 14, after the word "hereby," strike out "shall remain under the control of the Secretary of the Interior and," and in line 16 strike out "in his discretion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROYALTIES ON MINERALS FROM LEASED INDIAN LANDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8831) to provide for the collection of fees from royalties on production of minerals from leased Indian lands.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to collect a reasonable fee, not exceeding 3 per cent, from Indian lessors for moneys collected as royalties on production from the leasing of restricted Indian lands for mining purposes, the amounts collected to be covered into the Treasury subject to appropriation by Congress for necessary supervision in connection with the execution, development, and operation of leases: Provided, That no collection shall be made from Indian lessors where agency expenses are paid entirely from tribal funds.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 1, in line 9, after the word "Treasury," strike out "subject to appropriation by Congress for" and insert "as reimbursement for expenditures for"; and on page 2, in line 2, after the word "of," insert the word "such"; and in line 3 strike out "no collection shall be made from Indian lessors"; and in line 4, after the word "funds," insert a comma and the following language: "such amounts shall be covered into the Treasury and credited to the tribal funds from which such expenses were paid."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the principal effect of this amendment, outside of some change of form, will be to permit a tribe to be reimbursed for expenses of supervision of a lease belonging to an individual of the tribe. The change I have suggested is agreeable to the bureau, and I think to the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF INDIANS OCCUPYING RAILROAD LANDS IN ARIZONA, NEW MEXICO, OR CALIFORNIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8293) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913, and amended by the act of April 11, 1916, and the act of June 30, 1919, be, and the same are hereby, extended to March 4, 1929: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall apply only in cases where it is shown that the lands were actually occupied in good faith by Indians prior to March 4, 1913, and the applicants are otherwise entitled to receive such tracts in allotment under existing law but for the grant to the railroad company.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, in line 8, strike out the figures "1929" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1931."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESERVE SUPPLIES OR EQUIPMENT HELD BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7752) to limit the issue of reserve supplies or equipment held by the War Department.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

DEFERRED-PAYMENT SALES OF INDIAN ALLOTTED LANDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8291) to amend section 1 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L. 855), "An act to provide for determining the heirs of deceased Indians, for the disposition and sale of allotments of deceased Indians, for the leasing of allotments, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any Indian to whom an allotment of land has been made, or may hereafter be made, dies before the expiration of the trust period and before the issuance of a fee-simple patent, without having made a will disposing of said allotment as hereinafter provided, the Secretary of the Interior, upon notice and hearing, under such rules as he may prescribe, shall ascertain the legal heirs of such decedent, and his decision thereon shall be final and conclusive. If the Secretary of the Interior decides the heir or heirs of such decedent competent to manage their own affairs, he shall issue to such heir or heirs a patent in fee for the allotment of such decedent; if he shall decide one or more of the heirs to be incompetent, he may, in his discretion, cause such lands to be sold: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall find that the lands of the decedent are capable of partition to the advantage of the heirs, he may cause the shares of such as are competent, upon their petition, to be set aside and patents in fee to be issued to them therefor. All sales of lands allotted to Indians authorized by this or any other act shall be made under such rules and regulations and upon such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and he shall require a deposit of 10 per cent of the purchase price at the time of the sale. Should the purchaser fail to comply with the terms of sale prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, the amount so paid shall be forfeited; in case the balance of the purchase price is to be paid on such deferred payments, a further amount, not exceeding 15 per cent of the purchase price, together with all interest paid on such deferred installments, may be so forfeited for failure to comply with the terms of the sale. All forfeitures shall inure to the benefit of the heirs. Upon payment of the purchase price in full, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be issued to the purchaser patent in fee for such land: Provided, That the proceeds of the sale of inherited lands shall be paid to such heir or heirs as may be competent and held in trust subject to use and expenditure during the trust period for such heir or heirs as may be incompetent as their respective interests shall appear: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to issue a certificate of competency, upon application therefor, to any Indian, or in case of his death to his heirs, to whom a patent in fee containing restrictions on alienation has been or may hereafter be issued, and such certificate shall have the effect of removing the restrictions on alienation contained in such patent: Provided further, That hereafter any United States Indian agent, superintendent, or other disbursing agent of the Indian Service may deposit Indian moneys, individual or tribal, coming into his hands as custodian, in such bank or banks as he may select: Provided, That the bank or banks so selected by him shall first execute to the said disbursing agent a bond, with approved surety, in such amount as will properly safeguard the funds to be deposited. Such bonds shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, at the end of line 2, insert the following: "be and the same is amended so as to read as follows."

Then, in the first line, strike out the words "to amend" and insert the word "that."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE AND ROAD ON THE HOOPA VALLEY RESERVATION, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 441) to authorize an appropriation to pay half of the cost of a bridge and road on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, Calif.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, this bill and another on the Consent Calendar for the construction of a bridge and road on Indian reservations is entirely unnecessary from a legislative point of view. There is ample authority for appropriations for this purpose. If this bill passes, there will still need to be an appropriation to make it effective. The question as to the construction of roads across Indian reservations out of public funds is one very embarrassing to our committee, because we realize the needs that frequently exist. On the other hand, we do not desire to see the Indian Bureau appropriation loaded down, charged with appropriations for roads for the public. The appropriations for the Indian Bureau ought to be used for service for the Indians.

This road and that in another bill on the calendar would serve as precedents that would encourage many other projects to come in. I personally believe that provision should be made elsewhere for such projects. The other day I went before the Committee on Roads in favor of a bill introduced by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] proposing that provision be made for building roads on the public domain where it is necessary to connect up important highways.

It seems to me that this project should wait legislation of that kind and be taken care of when they would not be charged to the Indian Bureau, because as I say there is ample law now. I would feel obliged to object to the bill much as I regret it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is the effect of the proviso in this bill "That before any money is spent hereunder said State or county shall agree in writing to maintain the bridge and road without expense to the United States or Indians," in the present law?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no doubt it could be arranged by limitation—that none of the money should be spent until the State or county should agree to the maintenance of the bridge and road without expense to the United States or the Indians.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. LEA. With reference to the present authority, I have been under the impression which I got from the department that it is without legal authority. A similar road was denied by the department, although it was in favor of it, until a law was passed authorizing it. If it is conceded that the road is needed, of course, there is no injury done by passing the law. My information from the department is that authorization by such a law is necessary.

Mr. CRAMTON. The road is on an Indian reservation, and under the Snyder Act there is authority to make this appropriation. How keen the need is I am not informed. If there is need of it, it seems to me that the proper course is for the Indian Bureau to submit the item to the Bureau of the Budget and let the Bureau of the Budget submit it to the Appropriations Committee and let it be handled in that way. In the meantime I have sought this opportunity to emphasize the need for legislation of different character that will permit the Bureau of Public Roads to use funds not charged to the Indian Bureau for the construction of roads across Indian reservations where they are not needed by the Indians.

Mr. LEA. I think the gentleman will recognize how uncertain is the hope of taking the course he suggests by depending on general legislation, for there is no bill before Congress——

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a bill, and it is under hearing, and I am hopeful it will become a law.

Mr. LEA. I would like the gentleman's attention on the merits of this bill. If you will read the letter of the department, I think the gentleman will see the need of it.

This road is not part of the State highway system. The State highway system runs entirely to the south. Half of the productive lands on this reservation are on the opposite side of the river from the highway connection, and during a large portion of the year there is no way of crossing the river. It is a torrential mountain stream. Even the ferry can not be used during quite a portion of the year. During a large part of the year they are dependent upon the ferry, which is a material item of expense. The report indicates the income of these Indians would probably be increased even up to 50 per cent if the bridge were provided.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is already authority of law for the appropriation, and that is all that this bill will do. The gentleman will still have to get his appropriation. I suggest that he proceed directly to get his appropriation.

I suggest that he get his estimate up for consideration in the deficiency appropriation bill that will be passed next June.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to pass over the bill temporarily. I want to look into the question of the legal authority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF TIMBER ON OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8307) amending section 5 of the act approved June 9, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 218), so as to authorize the sale of timber on class 3 of the Oregon & California Railroad and Coos Bay wagon-road grant lands.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of June 9, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 218), and as amended and extended by section 3 of the act of February 26, 1919 (40 Stat. L. 1779), be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and in the manner now provided for the sale of timber on lands of class 2, sell the timber on any of the lands of class 3 which at the time application to purchase the timber is filed have been subject to entry for a period of at least two years and are not embraced in an application or entry, such sale of the timber not to preclude the disposal of the land under laws applicable thereto, subject to the right of the purchaser of the timber to cut and remove the same."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CARSON NATIONAL FOREST

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8824) to provide for the protection of the watershed within the Carson National Forest from which water is obtained for the Taos Pueblo, N. Mex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to withdraw by Executive order or proclamation, from any or all forms of entry or appropriation under the land laws of the United States, any lands of the United States within the watershed of the Rio Pueblo de Taos, Carson National Forest, N. Mex., from which the Indians of the Taos Pueblo obtain water for irrigation and domestic purposes: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, promulgate regulations to govern the use and occupancy of lands withdrawn under the provisions hereof, and to protect said lands from any act or condition which would impair the purity or volume of the water flowing therefrom.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FORT HALL INDIAN RESERVATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 308) authorizing an appropriation for the survey and investigation of the placing of water on the Michaud division and other lands in the Fort Hall Indian Reservation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000 for surveys and investigation to determine the feasibility and cost of irrigating the Michaud division and other lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation: Provided, That said sum, or any part thereof that may be expended for this work, shall be reimbursable when this or any other division of the project for which surveys shall be made hereunder is adopted for construction under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and there is hereby created a first lien against all such lands that may be brought within said division or divisions of the Fort Hall project, which lien shall attach to all lands benefited from the date of the adoption of the particular unit of the project under which such lands lie for construction, and said lien shall include all expenditures made therefor and shall be recited in any patent issued after the adoption of any such unit of the project for construction.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TIMBER CUT ON COOS BAY WAGON ROAD GRANT LAND

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 158) to amend chapter 137 of volume 39 of the United States Statutes at Large, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sentence in lines 17 to 20, page 220 of volume 39, United States Statutes at Large, chapter 137, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, reading as follows: "The timber thus purchased may be cut and removed by the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, within such period as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, which period shall be designated in the patent," be amended to read as follows: "The timber thus purchased may be cut and removed by the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, within such period and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which period and conditions shall be designated in the patent."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8311) to provide for the naming of a mountain or peak within the boundaries of the Lassen Volcanic National Park, Calif., in honor of Hon. John E. Raker, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this peak a name at the present time?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. No; it is an unnamed peak.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Geographic Board is hereby authorized and directed to name a prominent mountain or peak within the boundaries of the Lassen Volcanic National Park, Calif., in honor of the late John E. Raker, deceased, a former Member of Congress of the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 4, strike out the words "and directed," and in the same line, after the word "name," insert the word "permanently."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POSTMASTER GENERAL NEW

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as we all know, unfortunately the Postmaster General, Mr. Harry S. New, has not been in very good health. When I found that he was going to Florida I immediately wrote him and congratulated him upon selecting Florida and gave him the name of many of my friends down there. I know that my colleagues will be interested in a letter that I have just received from Mr. New, which reads as follows:

KEY WEST, FLA., February 17, 1928.

Hon. W. J. SEARS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SEARS: I very much appreciate your note of the 15th, which is before me this morning. I am sure I have made no mistake in selecting Key West as the place to come for relief from the temporary illness by which I have been incapacitated. The skies are bright, the temperature delightful, the people congenial, and everything that could have been done to speed my recovery has been done for me. At present my social activities are limited, but I hope to be able to see and meet your friends before I get away from Key West.

With many thanks for your kindly expressions and with best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. NEW.

This morning I wired Mr. New, stating that I hoped and believed his health would continue to rapidly improve, and that I was glad that he has found I had not overdrawn the picture of Florida's wonderful climate and the hospitality of our people. I added that I also hoped before he returned to Washington he would have a chance to make an investigation and also find that I had not overdrawn the congested postal conditions down there. I know that the Members of the House join me in the expression of the hope for a speedy recovery on the part of Mr. New. [Applause.]

GRANT OF ISLANDS TO OREGON FOR PARK PURPOSES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1193) granting certain rocks or islands to the State of Oregon for park purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the State of Oregon for use and maintenance for public park purposes those certain rocks or islands locally known as Castle, Tourist, and Elephant Rocks, situated in the Pacific Ocean near the town of Seal Rock and located approximately in fractional section 25, township 12 south, range 12 west, Willamette meridian, Oregon, on condition that same be maintained in their present condition as natural monuments or objects of scenic interest. In the event of failure on the part of the State to comply with the conditions imposed in this act title shall revert to the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to determine the facts and declare such forfeiture and such revision and restore said lands to the public domain, such order of the Secretary to be final and conclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TESTING PLANT OF AIR CORPS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7008) to authorize appropriations for the completion of the transfer of the experimental and testing plant of the Air Corps to a permanent site at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], is now in a hospital, and he asked me to give some attention to this bill; and I have here a memorandum from him and a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs from the Secretary of War in relation to the matter. I will ask to have the memorandum of Mr. JAMES read, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting the letter from the Secretary of War. If consent is given to the consideration of the bill, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is going to take all that reading and the consideration of an amendment, I shall have to object. We have 123 bills on the calendar waiting to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It will require three objections.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope the gentleman will not embarrass me in my effort to help my colleague. The amendments are very brief. I ask unanimous consent to insert both the memorandum and the letter without reading.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I should like to hear the reading of it. It is a removal to some place in Ohio. Why remove it?

Mr. CRAMTON. The removal is under way. Something like $2,000,000 is either already appropriated or nearly expended, and this is to complete the transaction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the document referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the documents referred to:

MEMORANDUM

H. R. 7008, Wright Field bill, calls for $1,200,000. The Director of the Budget was willing to approve for this amount, but as there was $300,000 in the Army appropriation bill which passed the House, I suggested he make it $900,000, the amount needed to complete.

To move from McCook Field to Wright Field involved an expenditure of $3,000,000. Congress gave a substantial sum the first year, but since that time Congress has been giving them $300,000 a year in the Army appropriation bill.

I have been out to Wright Field myself and think thousands of dollars can be saved if all money could be spent now.

Budget has had two representatives out there and they also agree to this.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1928.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MORIN: In compliance with your request of February 8, 1928, I am pleased to submit the following report on H. R. 7008.

The subject of the proposed legislation is "To authorize appropriations for the completion of the transfer of the experimental and testing plant of the Air Corps to a permanent site at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and for other purposes."

The removal from McCook Field and reestablishment at Wright Field of the matériel division of the Air Corps is being carried out in annual increments under the general provisions of the five-year program. The estimated cost of completing this project is $3,000,000, and the present status may be briefly stated as follows:

(a) A total of $1,500,000 was appropriated and obligated prior to the end of the fiscal year 1927.

(b) The sum of $300,000 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1928 and these funds already have been obligated for work to be completed during the current fiscal year.

(c) The Air Corps estimates for the fiscal year 1929 provide for an additional amount of $300,000 for this project during that year.

(d) The total expenditure on this project to date is $1,800,000, which leaves a balance of $1,200,000 required for completion of the project—$300,000 in 1929 and $900,000 to be provided in subsequent years.

The authorization contained in H. R. 7008 is to cover all of the construction which now remains to be completed. This work is now being carried on by annual increments of $300,000, as part of the five-year program, and as successive increments of funds become available the construction most urgently needed is undertaken during that year.

The proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that if H. R. 7008 be amended by reducing the total amount and the items specified therein, so as to bring the authorization down to $900,000, it would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

I therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to authorize an appropriation of $900,000. In view of the limited time in which this report is to be made, I am unable to make any recommendation as to breakdown of items.

A supplementary report in which this is done will be prepared and submitted within the next few days.

If any additional information from the War Department is desired, I shall be pleased to furnish it.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,200,000 to be expended for the completion of the transfer of the experimental and testing plant of the Air Corps to a permanent site at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and the construction and installation thereon of the following technical buildings and utilities and appurtenances as may, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, be necessary:

Hangars, $220,000; head house, $40,000; fire-engine house, $20,000; oil house, $5,000; boiler house, $320,000; shop extensions, $40,000; roofs and walls on garage, foundry, radio laboratory, maintenance building, wind tunnels, oil house, and armament laboratory, $210,000; utilidor extensions and pipe, $44,000; heating equipment in shops, hangars, and miscellaneous buildings, $36,000; electrical installations in shops and hangars, $45,000; grading in building area, $32,000; grading in flying field, $60,000; completion of roads and paving, $75,000; sidewalks, $20,000; street lighting, $20,000; completion of underground electrical distribution system, $13,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 4, strike out "$1,200,000" and insert "$900,000," and on page 2, line 1, strike out the word "following," and on page 2, line 3, strike out the words "in the judgment of the Secretary of War," and on page 2, line 4, strike out the remainder of the bill, so that as amended the language will read:

"Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $900,000 to be expended for the completion of the transfer of the experimental and testing plant of the Air Corps to a permanent site at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and the construction and installation thereon of the technical buildings and utilities and appurtenances as may be necessary."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan what the purpose was in removing this plant, and where it was removed from? We are very much interested in the Air Corps now. We are spending $4,000,000 on it.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not a subject that I have studied at any length. To-day I am simply acting for my colleague Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman desires, the letter of the Secretary of War can be read, giving the statement of the Department. I do happen to know that $1,500,000 has already been expended, and the appropriation just going through carries $300,000 more. Nine hundred thousand dollars is needed to complete it. That is what this bill carries. Frankly, I will say to the gentleman that I do not see any necessity of passing this bill. I think there is already authority sufficient.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Appropriations Committee has already made $300,000 available?

Mr. CRAMTON. One million five hundred thousand dollars is already expended, and the bill going through carries $300,000, and this $900,000 is to complete it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is your reason for the reduction of the amount in the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is my reason for the reduction in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (H. J. Res. 39) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive, for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, two Chinese subjects, to be designated hereafter by the Government of China.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to speak out of order for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we are maintaining the Military Academy for the purpose of training officers for our Army. We want to give them the very best and most modern military instruction possible. We want them to be the best military geniuses in the world in case of a war. Likewise we are maintaining the Naval Academy for the purpose of training naval officers, and I have never, in my 11 years in Congress, seen the wisdom of taking in foreign subjects and giving them the same training in the Naval Academy that we give our naval officers and of giving them the same training in our Military Academy that we give our own military officers, and let them know everything about our military training that our military men know and let them take back to their countries all of the knowledge about our naval training that our naval officers know. I think it ought to be stopped. But I realize it is hard to stop these bills.

I have incurred many times the hostile feeling of many of my colleagues by objecting to these bills on consent day, but I felt somebody ought to do it. I felt somebody ought to look into these bills carefully. We have on this floor now approximately 50 Members with a Consent Calendar of 123 bills to be called up. How many men have we here to object to them? I see my friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. He does good work on this calendar. We can depend on him in an emergency to object to real bad bills when they involve great big sums of money that affect the taxpayers. I see just one other man here, our friend from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER]. He objects to one now and then. Our friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will object to them occasionally when they affect irrigation or Indians, but when you get away from irrigation and Indians he is as silent as the grave as to the rest of them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; the gentleman is mistaken. He will object when they affect prohibition.

Mr. BLANTON. Except as to the Members I have mentioned you can not find any other men on this floor who will get up and object to a bill. If you ask them why, they will say, "I have bills on the calendar myself; if I object to other bills I will make somebody mad and they will object to my bills." So you see it is necessary for somebody who is not afraid to incur the displeasure of his colleagues, to look into these bills and be willing to stand up here in the interest of the people and object when they are improper bills of bad policy.

It takes three objections to stop this bill. We have already educated seven Chinese subjects in the Military Academy. Is not that enough? We have educated them there and given them the same training given the officers in the United States Army and sent them back to China. Is not that enough? We have educated a number of them in the Naval Academy. We have educated subjects of Japan in both academies. We have educated subjects of other countries in both academies. It ought to stop. I wonder whether we can get three objections against this bill? And we must get three objections to the next bill also. What is the use of carrying it on further? I do not believe the American people want it done. If we do this for the Chinese minister and for Siam, how are we going to turn down the Japanese minister if he comes and asks the same favor? How are we going to turn down the other ministers of all other foreign countries when we continue the precedent? If we are not going to treat all the countries alike we ought not to grant this permission in this bill, or in the next bill, and I hope we can get three objections to each and stop it. I object for one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INSTRUCTION AT UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY OF TWO SIAMESE SUBJECTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution 40, authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point two Siamese subjects, to be designated hereafter by the Government of Siam.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. SCHNEIDER, and Mr. McMILLAN objected.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9286) authorizing the appropriation of $65,000 to be expended by the American section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, for the purpose of making a survey to fix the boundary between the United States and Mexico, between El Paso, Tex., and Fort Quitman, Tex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, desiring, of course, at all times to save all the money possible for the Treasury and the further fact that this matter has already been appropriated for by the Appropriations Committee when I presented same to them some two weeks ago—and also prevailed upon the President and the Secretary of State to make an urgent request that this sum be appropriated for at the earliest possible moment in order to carry out a treaty, which means much to my home city of El Paso—El Paso and Hudspeth Counties and the entire United States, I ask that the bill lie on the table. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

IDAHO NATIONAL FOREST

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 142) to add certain lands to the Idaho National Forest, Idaho.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described areas be, and the same are hereby, included in and made a part of the Idaho National Forest, subject to all prior adverse rights; and the said lands shall hereafter be subject to all laws affecting national forests: All of the eastern two-thirds of townships 24 and 25 north, range 4 east, and all of townships 24 and 25 north, ranges 5 and 6 east, as are not already embraced in the Nezperce National Forest; all Boise meridian.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "forests," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert: "All of the eastern two-thirds of townships 24 and 25 north, range 4 east, all of townships 24 north, ranges 5 and 6 east, except sections 7 to 10, inclusive, 15 to 22, inclusive, and 27 to 34, inclusive, of township 24 north, range 5 east, and all of townships 25 north, ranges 5 and 6 east, which are not already embraced in the Nezperce National Forest; all Boise meridian."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHALLIS AND SAWTOOTH NATIONAL FORESTS, IDAHO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 144) to add certain lands to the Challis and Sawtooth National Forests, Idaho.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subject to any valid existing claim or entry, all lands of the United States within the areas hereafter described be, and the same are hereby, added to and made parts of the Challis and Sawtooth National Forests, Idaho, to be hereafter administered under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests; and the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), as amended, are hereby extended and made applicable to all other lands within said described areas:

West half section 6, west half section 8, west half section 17, west half section 20, township 8 north, range 14 east, Boise meridian; sections 1, 12, 13, 24, and 25, township 9 north, range 13 east, Boise meridian; west half section 7, west half section 18, west half section 19, west half section 30, west half section 31, township 9 north, range 14 east, Boise meridian; sections 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 23, and 24, township 10 north, range 12 east (unsurveyed), Boise meridian; section 1, east half section 2, west half section 6, section 7, east half section 11, sections 12, 13, 14, 18, and 19, west half northwest quarter, and south half section 20, south half southwest quarter, south half southeast quarter section 21, sections 23, 24, 25, and 26, south half northeast quarter, northwest quarter, south half section 27, sections 28, 29, 35, and 36, township 10 north, range 13 east. Boise meridian; lot 2 section 25, lots 4 and 5, northeast quarter southeast quarter, south half southeast quarter section 35, lots 1, 4, and 5, northeast quarter northeast quarter, south half northeast quarter, south half section 36, township 11 north, range 13 east, Boise meridian; lots 5, 6, 8, 12, and 13, south half southeast quarter section 30, lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, east half northwest quarter, east half southwest quarter, east half section 31, township 11 north, range 14 east, Boise meridian.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHALLIS NATIONAL FOREST

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6056) to provide for addition of certain land for the Challis National Forest.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands are hereby added to the Challis National Forest, Idaho, and made subject to all laws made applicable to national forests:

All unreserved lands lying south of Salmon River in townships 10 and 11 north, range 16 east, Boise meridian.

Township 10 north, range 17 east, Boise meridian: Sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 15, and 22; west half section 23; sections 26, 27, and 34; west half section 35.

Township 10 north, range 18 east, Boise meridian: South half section 4; sections 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10; west half section 15; sections 16, 17, 18, 20, and 21.

Township 9 north, range 17 east, Boise meridian: Sections 3, 17, 20; south half section 23; sections 24, 25, and 26; east half section 27; sections 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36.

Township 9 north, range 18 east, Boise meridian: Sections 17 to 36, inclusive.

Township 9 north, range 19 east, Boise meridian: Sections 21 and 28 to 33, inclusive.

Township 8 north, range 17 east, Boise meridian: Sections 4, 5, 8, and 9.

Township 8 north, range 18 east, Boise meridian: Sections 1 to 5, inclusive.

Township 8 north, range 19 east, Boise meridian: Section 6.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "Idaho," insert the words "subject to any valid existing claim or entry."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWING FROM ENTRY CERTAIN PUBLIC LAND IN MONTANA FOR A NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8110) withdrawing from entry the northwest quarter section 12, township 30 north, range 19 east, Montana meridian.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed now and taken up in about half an hour. One of the Members has asked for information from one of the departments on an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

SESQUICENTENNIAL OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 141) to authorize the President to invite the Government of Great Britain to participate in the celebration of the Sesquicentennial of the Discovery of the Hawaiian Islands, and to provide for the participation of the Government of the United States therein.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Territory of Hawaii will celebrate, from August 15 to August 19, 1928, the Sesquicentennial of the Discovery of the Hawaiian Islands by Capt. James Cook; and

Whereas the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii has appropriated the sum of $20,000 to meet the cost of conducting such ceremonies, and for the purpose of providing entertainment of delegates; and

Whereas in pursuance of a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, adopted by the senate thereof on April 14, 1927, and by the house of representatives thereof on April 16, 1927, the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii has requested the President "to extend a formal invitation to the Government of Great Britain, asking their participation by sending a man-of-war with delegates representing the Dominions most interested," and has asked that "the Federal Government send representatives for the occasion, with the presence of such units of the United States Fleet as may be spared": Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend a formal invitation to the Government of Great Britain to participate in the said celebration by sending a man-of-war with delegates representing the Dominions most interested.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of defraying the expense of participation by the Government of the United States in the said celebration, an appropriation of the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized, to include transportation, subsistence, or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any previous act), and such other expenses as the President shall deem proper.

By unanimous consent the whereases were stricken out.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CALAVERAS BIG TREES, CALIFORNIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5545) granting certain lands to the State of California.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon conveyance to and acceptance by the State of California of either the North Calaveras Big Tree Grove, described as the west half of the southwest quarter of section 14; the east half of the southeast quarter; the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter; the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 15; the north half of the northeast quarter; the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter; the east half of the northwest quarter of section 22, township 5 north, range 15 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; or, the South Calaveras Big Tree Grove, described as the south half of the northwest quarter; the north half of the southwest quarter; the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28; the southeast quarter; the south half of the southwest quarter of section 29; the north half of the northeast quarter; the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter; the northwest quarter; the north half of the southwest quarter of section 32; the east half of the northeast quarter; the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter; the north half of the southeast quarter; the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter; the southwest quarter of section 31, township 5 north, range 16 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; or, both of the aforesaid groves, and the dedication as a State park of the lands so conveyed and accepted by the State of California, within six years from the passage of this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall, upon request of the Governor of California, and with the concurrence of the Secretary of Agriculture issue a patent to the State of California for the following-described lands: The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 22; the north half of the southeast quarter of section 24; the north half; the southwest quarter; the west half of the southeast quarter of section 25; the east half of the west half, the southeast quarter, the south half of the northeast quarter of section 26; the north half of the northeast quarter of section 35, township 5 north, range 15 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 31, township 5 north, range 16 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian.

SEC. 2. That the conveyance hereby authorized shall be subject to the right of the United States to occupy or to authorize the occupancy of so much of the conveyed lands as may be required for rights of way for roads, trails, railroads, transmission lines, or conduits constructed and maintained by or under the United States: Provided, That the said State of California shall not have the right to sell or convey the land acquired under the provisions of this act, or any part thereof, or to devote said land to other than State park purposes, and if the said land is sold or conveyed or is used for other than State park purposes, contrary to the provisions of this act, the part so conveyed or used shall revert to the United States; the conditions and reservation herein provided for to be expressed in the patent.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 9, after the word "lines" strike out the word "or"; after the word "conduits" on page 3, line 9, insert the words "or other works"; on page 3, line 10, after the word "under" insert the words "the authority of"; and on page 3, line 19, insert the following: "Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, gas, coal, or other mineral deposits found at any time in the land, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UTAH NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1312) to change the name of Utah National Park, the establishment of which is provided for by the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat., p. 593), to the "Bryce Canyon National Park," and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know the reason for the change, that is all.

Mr. COLTON. This national park has always been known as Bryce Canyon. A bill was passed a year or so ago changing it to the Utah National Park.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Why Bryce Canyon?

Mr. COLTON. It is simply a local name. It is named after the man who first settled in that section, and everybody in that country knows it as Bryce Canyon.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I was simply looking after the interests of Bill Thompson. I was afraid it was another Bryce.

Mr. COLTON. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the area within the State of Utah described in the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 593), providing for the establishment of the Utah National Park, shall be, when established as a national park, known as the Bryce Canyon National Park.

SEC. 2. That the east half section 25, township 36 south, range 4 west; the east half southwest quarter section 20, and all of sections 21, 29, and 30, township 36 south, range 3 west; all of sections 24 and 25, township 37 south, range 4 west; and all of sections 19 and 30, township 37 south, range 3 west, Salt Lake meridian, be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the Powell National Forest and made a part of the Bryce Canyon National Park, subject to the provisions of the aforesaid act of Congress, approved June 7, 1924.

SEC. 3. That unsurveyed sections 28 and 33, township 36 south, range 3 west, and section 20, township 37 south, range 3 west, Salt Lake meridian, public lands of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, added to and made a part of the Bryce Canyon National Park, subject to the provisions of the aforesaid act of Congress, approved June 7, 1924.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALLOWANCES OF CHAPLAIN AT UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6652) to fix the pay and allowances of chaplain at the United States Military Academy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know something about the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can not recommend myself as being the best authority——

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is the best authority on some things.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I am, on what the gentleman refers to, if the gentleman will permit me, but this is not one of them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is this for the purpose of furnishing quarters, or does it increase the salary?

Mr. CRAMTON. The report from the department, the gentleman will note, says:

The chaplain at the United States Military Academy shall, while so serving, receive a salary of $4,000 per annum and be entitled to the same allowances with respect to public quarters, fuel, and light as those allowed to a captain.

I am in favor of the passage of the bill for the following reasons:

The office of chaplain at the United States Military Academy was established by the act of April 4, 1818. Importance, honor, and dignity are attached to the position. The responsibilities of the office have increased in proportion to the expansion of the Corps of Cadets, which has more than trebled in strength since the date (1896) of the last permanent legislation upon the subject.

The remuneration for the chaplain provided in the present law, act of February 18, 1896 (29 Stat. 8), is inadequate to the importance of the position and not commensurate with the work performed. Congress has recognized this fact by fixing the chaplain's pay at $4,000 per annum in recent appropriation acts. The proposed legislation involves no change in the compensation now allowed; it is simply for the purpose of enacting into the permanent law a rate of pay for the chaplain equal to the amount prescribed in recent annual appropriation acts.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman know how the salary compares with the salary of the chaplain at the Naval Academy?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of February 18, 1896, as provides that the chaplain at the United States Military Academy shall, while so serving, receive the same pay and allowances as a captain, mounted, is hereby amended to read as follows: "The chaplain at the United States Military Academy shall, while so serving, receive a salary of $4,000 per annum and be entitled to public quarters and the same allowances with respect to fuel and light as those allowed to a captain."

With the following committee amendments:

Line 9, strike out the words "public quarters and." Line 10, after the words "respect to," insert the words "public quarters."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REMOVING A CLOUD ON TITLE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1425) an act to remove a cloud on title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States hereby relinquishes all the right, title, and interest of the United States acquired by virtue of a marshal's deed dated August 21, 1848, in the following-described property situated in Harrison County, Miss., to wit: The west half southwest quarter section 30, township 7 south, range 10 west, and east half southeast quarter section 25, township 7 south, range 1 west, lying south of Bernards Bayou and containing about 150 acres.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJUSTING DISPUTES OF CLAIMS ON FAULTY SURVEYS, LAKE COUNTY, STATE OF FLORIDA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5695) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to equitably adjust disputes and claims of settlers and others against the United States and between each other arising from incomplete or faulty surveys in township 19 south, range 26 east, Tallahassee meridian, Lake County, in the State of Florida.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to equitably adjust disputes and claims of settlers, entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States, their heirs or assigns, against the United States and between each other arising from incomplete or faulty surveys in township 19 south, range 26 east, and in sections 7, 8, 17, 18, 19, 30, 31, township 19 south, range 27 east, Tallahassee meridian, Lake County, in the State of Florida, and to issue directly or in trust, as may be found necessary or advisable, patent to such settlers, entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees, their heirs or assigns, for land claimed through settlement, occupation, purchase, or otherwise in said described area, preserving, as far as he may deem equitable, to those claimants now in possession of public land the right to have patented to them the areas so occupied: Provided, That a charge of not less than the appraised value of the land, exclusive of any improvements placed thereon, be made for each acre or fraction thereof of Government land patented under the provisions of this act, except that adjustment may be effected by exchange of lands patented for lands substantially equal in area, in which event payment shall be required of the difference in appraised values where the value of the land owned by the Government exceeds that of the land offered in exchange: Provided further, That rights acquired subsequent to the withdrawal of December 23, 1925, shall not be recognized or be subject to adjustment hereunder.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to accept any and all conveyances of land and to cause all necessary surveys to be made to effect the purposes of this act. All adjustments hereunder shall conform to the approved plats of such survey or resurvey, and no other survey will be recognized.

SEC. 3. That in fixing the appraised price of such lands the Secretary of the Interior shall consider and give effect to the good faith and equities of the occupants of any of the areas found to be public land; and if the whole or any part of such land be within the corporate limits of the town of Tavares, the survey of the lots, blocks, streets, and alleys shall be considered as executed under the provisions of section 2384, Revised Statutes, but as far as practicable shall conform to the existing surveys and plats of the lots in such town: Provided, That the Secretary may, in his discretion, issue a patent to Lake County, Fla., to not exceeding 1 acre upon which the county courthouse is located, such patent to provide that the land shall revert to the Government of the United States if the county sells any part thereof or devotes it to any use other than as a site for a courthouse and grounds.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of section 2382, Revised Statutes, as modified by sections 2384 and 2385, Revised Statutes, shall extend to all areas surveyed as within and a part of the town of Tavares, but any applicant may elect to proceed under section 1 of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS TO THE CABAZON WATER CO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5687) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain public lands to the Cabazon Water Co., issue patent therefor, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to the Cabazon Water Co., a nonprofit corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of California and mutually owned by the citizens of the community of Cabazon, Riverside County, Calif., for the following tract of public land situated in the county of Riverside, State of California, to wit:

The north half of the southwest quarter of section 29 and the south half of the southeast quarter of section 20, township 2 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, for water-supply and water-protection purposes, upon payment therefor of the sum of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That whenever said lands cease to be used for said purposes, then in that event title to said lands shall revert to the United States upon a finding of such failure by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That said patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all gas, oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in such land and the right to the use of the land for extracting same under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided further, That such patent shall contain a reservation of a right of way over and across said tract for a public road following substantially the location of the present roadway through Millard Canyon, said right of way to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CAPT. JAMES COOK MEMORIAL COLLECTION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 81) to authorize the coinage of silver 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of the Hawaiian Islands by Capt. James Cook and for the purpose of aiding in establishing a Capt. James Cook memorial collection in the archives of the Territory of Hawaii.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of the Hawaiian Islands by Capt. James Cook, and for the purpose of aiding in establishing a Capt. James Cook memorial collection in the archives of the Territory of Hawaii, there shall be coined in the mints of the United States silver 50-cent pieces to the number of 10,000, such 50-cent pieces to be of a standard troy weight, composition, diameter, and design as shall be fixed by the director of the mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, which said 50-cent pieces shall be legal tender in any payment of their face value.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall be issued only upon the request of the Cook Sesquicentennial Commission of Hawaii and in such numbers and at such times as they shall request upon payment by such commission to the United States of the par value of such coins.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for security of the coin or for any other purpose, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparation of this coinage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WOMEN IN THE WORLD WAR

The next business on the Consent Calendar was Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) authorizing an additional appropriation to be used for the memorial building provided for by a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War," approved June 7, 1924.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is proposing a gift of $50,000 to supplement the former gift of $150,000. There is nothing in the report to show that this has been submitted to the Budget, whether or not it is in accordance with the President's financial program, and I am obliged to object.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold the objection for a moment?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. My understanding is that it has been submitted to the Director of the Budget.

Mr. CRAMTON. If there is anything in the report to that effect I have overlooked it.

Mr. LUCE. If it is not in the report I overlooked putting it there.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have the report before me and I do not see anything in it stating that fact.

Mr. LUCE. It is quite true. It is my own oversight.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it has been submitted to the Budget?

Mr. LUCE. My recollection is to that effect.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When a bill is passed over without prejudice, does it retain the same status on the calendar, or does it require three to object to it in order to put it off the calendar the next time it is called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It retains its status on the calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON. In this case no objection has been made.

LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9036) to increase the salary of the Librarian of Congress.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Librarian of Congress on and after July 1, 1928, shall receive salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to commend the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] on the splendid work that he has done and is still doing for the Library. I think it is worth special mention.

The bill that he had passed in Congress some time ago, which permits the Library to accept bequests, has brought some very valuable gifts to that institution. It has been worth a great deal to the people of the United States. I am glad to see that he recognizes the splendid service that is being given by the librarian. If there is any man here in Washington who deserves a salary of $10,000 a year it is Mr. Herbert Putnam. As stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he has charge of 757 people. He has $9,000,000 worth of real-estate property in his custody. He has 3,500,000 books under his control, besides about 7,000,000 manuscripts and periodicals. He and his force are most valuable adjuncts to any Member of Congress. He is the one whose force looks up for you every item of research that your women's clubs send you, and everything that any of your constituents seek knowledge upon here in Washington. He is a valuable help to every Member of Congress.

While on my feet I want to say that he has one of the most efficient and well-qualified assistants—Mr. Frederick W. Ashley. And his executive assistant, Mr. Allen R. Boyd, is very efficient and accommodating. They are as valuable men as I ever saw in charge of a Government office. I wish it were so that the gentleman from Massachusetts had gone further and given these gentlemen a substantial increase in salary, because they deserve it. And both Mr. Hugh A. Morrison and Mr. George H. Milne deserve like raises. I hope before he stops his good work that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] will bring in a proper bill and give all of these men a salary commensurate with the splendid work that they all perform.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I indorse everything that the gentleman has said. If my information is correct, the young men and young ladies who are working over there receive the poorest salaries of any force in the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. They are the poorest paid employees in the Government.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. And yet the most valuable?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I hope as the gentleman stated that they may receive some consideration at the hands of this committee.

Mr. BLANTON. That was going to be my last comment on the subject. All of the employees there are the poorest paid in the Government. And they should have substantial raises. Many are working for salaries of $1,200 to $1,500 per year and have families to support.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman has said that Mr. Putnam has in his charge $9,000,000 worth of property. That is merely the value of the real estate.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; of the real estate alone.

Mr. BURTON. But he has 3,500,000 books under his control.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, you can not estimate the value of the books and periodicals. I refer to the actual real estate value of the Library when I said $9,000,000.

Mr. BURTON. I have been familiar with the Library for more than 30 years, and I approve everything that has been said in favor of increasing the salary of the librarian.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Ohio knows, of course, that there are books over there whose value you can not estimate. You can not estimate the value in money of these 3,500,000 volumes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What is the present salary of the librarian?

Mr. BLANTON. Seven thousand five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. DENISON. And this bill increases this to $10,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. While we are increasing the salary of the librarian from $7,500 to $10,000 a year, why not increase the salaries of the employees who the gentleman says are so poorly paid? Why did not the bill consider them also?

Mr. BLANTON. I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts did not want to bite off more than he could properly masticate at this time. I believe we will yet bring in a bill that will do justice to the assistants and to the other employees in that institution.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It seems singular that we increase salaries from $7,500 a year to $10,000 a year but yet ignore the employees that the gentleman himself says are underpaid.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure that they are underpaid, and I am sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts will tell you he realizes that and that he will soon bring in a bill to take care of them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But the gentleman from Massachusetts does not tell us anything.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

I am in hearty accord with the bill to raise the salary of the efficient Librarian of Congress. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts why he did not bring in a bill as has been suggested by several gentlemen here, to me privately, increasing the salaries of other efficient employees. For instance, there is Mr. Morrison in the congressional reading room. You can not place a value upon his services to Congressmen who go there looking up data. I think he told me that he has been there for 45 years.

Mr. COLTON. And he has a very able assistant in Mr. Mills.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; Mr. Milne, and also a splendid lady in the congressional reading room, very efficient and intelligent. I can not call her name at the present, but she is splendid; and he is getting the same salary that he got 25 years ago—I mean Mr. Morrison. If I am in error about that, the gentleman from Massachusetts will correct me. Why not bring a bill in here as suggested, which seems to be the sentiment of the House, increasing the salary of the faithful employees there, all through the Congressional Library, and especially the men like Mr. Morrison and Mr. Milne, and the handsome and intelligent lady with the Martha Washington hair?

You can go there, I will state to my friend, and ask Mr. Morrison, Mr. Milne, and the lady to get you any statement made by a Senator or Representative 30 or 40 years ago. It may only be a sentence, and yet they will get that for you in 10 minutes' time. People like that ought not to be paid to-day, considering the excessive cost of living, just what they were paid 25 years ago. I am in favor of raising the salaries of those in the Library who do the work in the Library. I was wondering why they could not get their compensation increased to a figure commensurate to their service. I was just asking a question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that all of these employees have been classified under the classification act, and they ought not to be raised outside of the general classification. Otherwise we would have to raise the salaries of all of the employees of the Government in Washington. They have already had their raise under the classification act.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It must be a very small raise, considering the small salaries many of these employees tell me they are getting.

Mr. BLANTON. Lots of Library employees are getting less than $1,200 a year.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Well, that is a reflection upon this Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are 65,000 employees of the Government. We do not want to get into trouble by raising one bunch without raising the rest.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Let us raise all the bunches if they are as poorly paid as the Library employees. We raised our own, I recall, about two years ago.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has explained the situation. These employees are under the classified schedule, and much as I would like to see the employees of the Library receive more pay, it would be bold, indeed, for me to urge an invasion of the classification scheme so recently put into effect, although my sympathies are wholly in harmony with the suggestion that the employees of the Library deserve a higher wage.

While I am on my feet I would express my appreciation of the generous words of the gentleman from Texas, not only those concerning myself but also and of more importance those concerning the Library and the librarian. Few privileges have I more valued than that of having share, however small, in the conduct of this great institution, which does so much credit to the country, and I am glad of every opportunity to advance its interests.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Are all the employees of the Library, except those the gentleman named, under the classified service?

Mr. LUCE. As I understand, the librarian himself is not exempted. A group of men who deserved more salary received consideration last year from the Board of Classification. The first step was to transfer these men from the second grade to the first grade, which specifies a salary of $7,500, evidently contemplating that Congress could go above that amount if it so desired. It would have been an invasion of the classification system if they had attempted to take anybody from the second grade and give him an increase beyond the minimum of the first grade.

Now that the Classification Board has made the change, it becomes practicable for the first time to recognize the exceptional circumstances of Mr. Putnam's employment, the long duration of his term of service, the efficiency of his work, and his value to the Nation; but, if I understand it rightly, he still remains nominally as classified in the first grade of the classification act.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think my colleague [Mr. DENISON] inadvertently referred to the civil service act. These employees are not under the civil service, as I understand.

Mr. LUCE. They are in the classified service.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state whether or not these men, like Morrison and Milne and others, are now properly classified? They might be put in a class where they could not be given a raise even under the reclassification law. I am reliably informed this has been done by the Reclassification Board many times in other departments here.

Mr. LUCE. It seems to me that their service in the Library would warrant a higher classification than they have received.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is the librarian under the classified service?

Mr. LUCE. He is in the classified service.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What does that provide?

Mr. LUCE. The first grade specifies $7,500, leaving any increase over that to the action of Congress. The second grade in the classified service ranges from $6,000 to $7,500.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is not the gentleman invading the classified service when he proposes to increase the salary of the librarian, just as much as if he were proposing the increase of salaries of these other men? Congress could increase the salaries of any of them, so far as that is concerned, regardless of the classified service.

Mr. LUCE. I could not have brought out clearly the fact that the framers of the classified system evidently intended that any increase over the figures appearing there—$7,500—should be by the action of Congress. They hoped that the Congress would not interfere with the second and lower grades, but left it to us to act as we saw fit in the matter of the first grade.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not oppose the increase of salary. I think the present librarian ought to have an increase, but I think some of these other men ought either to be increased to a higher grade so that they could get an increase or Congress should grant them a favor. They grant us favors. They do everything they can possibly for us. If we can not increase the salary by act of Congress of those who are included in the classified service, then I would like to have these gentlemen raised in their grades of the classified service.

Mr. LUCE. While the gentlemen and I are in accord in this matter, in case action is to be taken our first step should be to go before the Classification Board and present our arguments, and if they were futile then we would be justified in coming on the floor of the House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We would have to depend on the gentleman to do that because he knows more about it than we do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say to the gentleman that this matter comes up every year. It comes before our legislative subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, of which I have had the honor to be a member for a number of years. I think some of these men earn more money than they are getting, and we all appreciate their splendid service. Our subcommittee looks into it every year. But we realize that if we start to raise a few men here and there, you have got to think about the 60,000 or 75,000 other employees in this city.

We have delegated this matter to the Classification Board and they have gone over it in a systematic way and Congress should not tear up what they have done. If we start to doing that we will soon have to do the whole classification work all over again, and for that reason we have felt it ought to be left to some general reclassification or some systematic action by Congress rather than to arbitrarily pick up a few men here and there and raise them every year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman will find that the librarian is in the classification service at $7,500, and because you can do it you pick him out and increase his salary but do not increase the salaries of others.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that we have raised the salaries of a few of the heads of other bureaus. We have taken them out of the classified service and given a number of them $10,000. That is the excuse and the only excuse for picking out this one man at this time. But he is a splendid high-class man.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS, MUNITIONS, OR IMPLEMENTS OF WAR TO BELLIGERENT NATIONS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunitions, or implements of war to belligerent nations.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is a declaration of national policy upon a tremendously important question. Whether the policy expressed in the resolution is right or wrong is in no sense at issue at this time, but the question which is involved is whether a bill of this sweeping and far-reaching character should have a place upon the Consent Calendar, with just a few dozen of us gathered here. I do not think it should, and with all deference to the author of the resolution, and I have no more admiration and esteem for any person in this House than I have for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], I feel obliged at this time to object, with the thought that it should come up when the House as a whole may consider it and pass upon it. Therefore I object to its present consideration.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I concede that this is a measure of far-reaching importance but it would be a most impressive manifestation of the interest of this House of Representatives in the cause of peace if this could be passed here without objection. For that reason I placed it on the Consent Calendar. If, however, the gentleman thinks it should have further discussion or that there may possibly be objection to it, I shall be compelled to acquiesce.

Mr. HOOPER. There will be ample opportunity for bringing it up in such a way as to have it considered by the whole House. The whole membership will be greatly interested in hearing it discussed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

OIL AND GAS PROSPECTING PERMITS AND LEASES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 479) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant certain oil and gas prospecting permits and leases.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, but not intending to object, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER] asked me if he were not here—and I do not see him here at this time—to ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MONUMENT IN COMMEMORATION OF WILLIAM RUFUS KING

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7903) to authorize the erection at Clinton, Sampson County, N. C., of a monument in commemoration of William Rufus King, former Vice President of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult to object to anything that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] might want, but this bill proposes an expenditure of public funds with which to build a monument in North Carolina to a gentleman of limited fame. He happened to have been Vice President in a very unimportant period of our history. I do not believe we can afford now to start in on a monument-building program generally around the country and therefore I am obliged to object.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I withhold the objection.

Mr. LUCE. The Committee on the Library for several years has shared the views of the gentleman from Michigan and we have looked adversely on proposals to erect monuments, but we have thought that a comparatively small expenditure for markers commemorating the birthplaces of distinguished men was not a great burden on the Treasury; and where expended in places of comparatively small size, at a distance from populous centers, where there could be no considerable historical society to attend to the need, it was not inappropriate to provide for it from the Federal Treasury.

This is a case of commemorating the birthplace of one of the Vice Presidents of the United States with an expenditure of $2,500 for a marker. I trust the gentleman will not consider this so serious a matter as to require further consideration in the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may say, first, the appropriation goes beyond what might be called a marker, and if there were any real justification for it in the fame of the person honored, there would be a willingness to contribute that would be somewhat removed even from the place where it is to be erected.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman point out where it goes beyond the purpose I have designated? It was our intention by the amendments as printed to erect a tablet or marker.

Mr. CRAMTON. I judged by the sum involved that it went beyond the marker stage.

Mr. LUCE. These markers are usually boulders with a bronze plate on them, or else a cement structure, very simple, and, of course, at a cost of $2,500 nothing very elaborate could be erected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does this include the expenses of the celebration when the monument is unveiled?

Mr. LUCE. The Federal Government has rarely taken part in the dedication of markers. The matter is not of such consequence as to warrant that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think there are very few districts but what could think of someone who has lived in that district at some time who had rendered services somewhat commensurate with those to be celebrated by this so-called marker, and if we are to have $2,500 markers scattered in every Member's district, it will run into money.

Mr. LUCE. We report, perhaps, four or five a year only.

Mr. CRAMTON. And in most cases, as the gentleman knows, "without cost to the Government."

Mr. LUCE. Not in the case of these markers. The gentleman is in error in that respect. The provision for markers so far as I know has always been made in precisely this way.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall feel obliged to-day to object.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] withhold his objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I withhold it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want the gentleman to hear me a moment if he will. I agree in large measure with what the gentleman has said about putting up monuments or markers to inconsequential people, and I would say to the gentleman that if this was just an ordinary man whose birthplace I am undertaking to have marked, there would be merit in what the gentleman has said. However, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this man, William Rufus King, who was the Congressman from my district from 1810 until 1816. He then went to Alabama and was a member of the Constitutional Convention of Alabama. He was elected to the Senate from Alabama. He went to St. Petersburg, representing the American Government as a member of the American Embassy there. He came back to this country and was again elected to the Senate from Alabama. Then he was made minister to France. He came back and was again elected Senator from Alabama and elected president pro tempore of the Senate and then was nominated and elected Vice President, being on the ticket with Franklin Pierce. He died while he was Vice President of the United States. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that men like Edward Everett, Douglas, Benton, and Pierce, and Franklin Pierce the President, all spoke of him as being one of the great men of the country.

I introduced a bill having for its purpose the erection of a monument to this man, but meeting the very idea that has been advanced by the gentleman from the Michigan, the chairman of the committee told me very frankly he would not recommend a monument but would recommend a marker or tablet.

We are furnishing the land down there and it does seem to me the gentleman should not object. I do not think the matter of $2,500 will break the Government or be in conflict with the President's policy of economy. I hope the gentleman will forego his objection at this time and withdraw it and let this bill go through. It would be very pleasing to me if the gentleman would do so, and I hope he will. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. I appreciate, of course, the adverse circumstances prevailing here to-day——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Oh, no; I am not considering that at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. But I do not eat oysters, so I am not involved. I do not understand why $2,500 is needed for a marker unless there is to be a joy ride and a celebration, an oyster roast, or something of that kind.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language is not to exceed $2,500.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, they always spend the full amount. I will say to the gentleman, yielding to the sentiment that grows out of the hospitality of the gentleman, that if the gentleman would accept an amendment providing $1,000, they could then put in a marker as big as the circumstances justify.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Split the difference and make it $1,500.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will accept the $1,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; it is too late now.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE PRESS

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by Judge CHARLES H. BRAND, Congressman from the eighth district of Georgia, in regard to H. R. 7912, which deals with foreign language press. This speech was made over the Fellowship Forum Radio Station, WTFF, on Friday evening, February 3.

There was no objection.

The speech, with the prefatory statement of the editor of the Fellowship Forum thereon, is as follows:

Declaring that the foreign-language newspapers published in America constitute a national peril and an uninterrupted menace to our form of government, Congressman CHARLES H. BRAND, of Georgia, proceeded to explain the dangers and set up the remedy for them, in an eloquent address over the Fellowship Forum Radio Station, WTFF, on Friday evening, February 3. Mr. BRAND has a bill now before Congress to curb the publishing of literature in other than the English language in this country, and is an authority on this important subject. His address follows:

"The bill which I have been invited to discuss, which was introduced in the House of Representatives by me on December 19, 1927, proposes: 'To exclude from the mails certain newspapers containing matter printed in foreign language.' The bill provides:

"That any newspaper containing matter, printed in a foreign language, advising, advocating, or teaching opposition to all organized government; the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of any State of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof; the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers (either of specific individuals or of officers generally) of the Government of the United States or of any State of the United States or any political subdivision thereof, or the unlawful damage, injury, or destruction of property, is hereby declared to be nonmailable; except that any copy of such newspaper containing a true and complete English translation of the text of all such matter contained therein shall not be excluded from the mails as nonmailable matter under the provisions of this act.

"The second provision of the bill makes it a criminal offense if an attempt is made to distribute foreign-language newspapers through the mails without an English translation thereof.

"Such legislation as this is a matter of grave importance, particularly for the following reasons:

"Because in 1921 there were 916, and in 1927 there were 1,231, foreign-language newspapers printed and circulated in 38 States of this country, and in some of the territories and insular possessions of the United States. In addition to this, there are foreign-language newspapers printed in 47 different countries of the Old World which are mailed here and circulated in this country.

"Because of the present trouble and the policy of the present administration in regard to Nicaragua, Mexico, and China, all of which countries for over 12 months have been in strife, turmoil, and at times in actual war.

"Because of the infirmities of the present immigration law, and the failure and inability on the part of the Government to effectively enforce the same.

"Because of the constant friction and animosity and the greed and jealousy existing among European countries.

"Because of the unfriendly attitude on the part of practically all the nations of the world toward the United States.

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS

"However, there is another and more powerful reason for the necessity of this legislation in which the people of the United States, over and above all other things, are interested and that is preserving America for Americans, and holding in perpetuity our form of government and preserving inviolate American ideals and American institutions. It is the duty of the American Congress, and of the editors of the English press of the United States, and of the rank and file of the native-born Americans, and of all foreign citizens who are loyal to our country and its traditions, to let the world know that we will not tolerate and that there is no place in this country for any foreign-language newspaper or any foreign-language newspaper editors if they print and circulate treasonable publications such as covered in the proposed bill.

"According to figures compiled in 1924 by the Manufacturers' Record from the census of 1921, there was a total of 916 daily and weekly newspapers and periodicals printed in foreign languages in this country and having an aggregate circulation per issue of 9,896,371.

"There were 146 daily newspapers published in foreign languages having an aggregate daily circulation of 2,418,823; 400 weekly newspapers and periodicals published in foreign languages with an aggregate circulation per issue of 3,489,648; and 370 publications in foreign languages other than daily, Sunday, or weekly with an aggregate circulation per issue of 3,987,900.

IN 30 LANGUAGES

"These foreign-language publications include about 30 of the principal languages represented among the foreign population of the United States.

"With the exception of the readers of these foreign-language publications, the public knows nothing about the doctrines these papers are preaching and whether they are patriotic or unpatriotic, American or bolshevistic, in their teachings.

"American citizens who are inclined to ignore the menace of radical and subversive propaganda in the United States should remember that our country faces a problem found in no other country. We have not only the pink and red radicals among our native stock but we have 14,000,000 aliens and 24,000,000 persons of foreign parentage who are subjected to pernicious anti-American propaganda.

"In New York City, the headquarters of the socialist-communist forces in this country, there are printed 34 foreign-language daily newspapers with an estimated daily circulation of 947,000, which exceeds the combined daily circulation of the New York Times, Herald-Tribune, and American by 79,000.

DANGEROUS TO AMERICA

"According to a publication entitled 'Better America Federation of California,' a magazine printed in Los Angeles, there is an average of 275 papers printed in foreign languages in other countries and circulated in the United States that are openly preaching the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.

"It also says that editors and publishers of the foreign-language newspapers in America may contend that they are not engaged in activities subversive to our form of government and we are not so charging all of them, but we are pointing out that in a country where the common language is English, the circulation of so many papers in other languages is dangerous to Americanism. As long as millions of peoples of foreign birth or descent in America get information on American affairs through the eye of those of their own nationality, such persons can not become truly Americanized.

"There are circulated in the United States newspapers, magazines, and periodicals printed in foreign languages from the following countries of the world: Argentine Republic, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, British Guiana, Bulgaria, Canada, Cape Colony, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Denmark, Egypt, France, Germany, England, Scotland, Wales, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, India, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Korea, Mesopotamia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, San Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela.

"I have received, since the introduction of the present bill, letters from private citizens, American newspapers, periodicals, and magazines from nine different States indorsing the bill. There have been dissenters from two sources only, one from the Jewish Tribune published in New York, and the other from A. Joseph Di Silvestro, owner and editor of the La Libera Parola, of New York.

"In the issue of The Fellowship Forum of April 20, 1927, there appeared an article written by A. Di Domenica, who is the pastor of an Italian Baptist church in Philadelphia, in which he asserted that the Italian press, printed in foreign language, circulating in this country had, with a few exceptions, conducted a campaign in this country detrimental to America, and for this reason he strongly advocated the passage of this legislation as being imperative for the welfare of America.

IMPUDENT AND INDECENT

"This man Silvestro replied to the editorial in his paper in a very ugly, impudent, and un-American manner, his editorial containing severe criticisms of the Italians of this country whose conduct and lives were loyal to America. The Italian Baptist preacher also stated that the Silvestro editorial contained many vile things which were so indecent they could not be published in English.

"I want to say here and now, and without any suggestion from any person to do so, that there is no newspaper printed in the United States which is more loyal to America, the American Government, the American people, and American institutions than The Fellowship Forum.

"The Manufacturers' Record not only has taken notice of this perilous situation in its editorial columns in 1924 but is still in favor of this character of legislation. Its latest editorial utterance upon the subject appears in yesterday's issue, entitled 'Treasonable publications should be suppressed,' which is as follows:

"'Somewhat on the line of the editorial, "Be on guard," which appeared on the cover page of the Manufacturers' Record, December 15, Representative C. H. BRAND, of the eighth district of Georgia, introduced a bill in Congress to exclude from the mails certain newspapers containing matter printed in foreign languages.

"'Not only should this bill be enacted into law, but also that law should be enforced to the very limit. Opposition may be expected not only from the lawless element of the country—the anarchists, soviets, communists, and other reds—but also, in some measure, from so-called "liberals," among both the people and the press, particularly the demagogues in both those circles. Such opposition makes enactment and enforcement only the more imperative.

"'The length to which such published instigations to communistic insurrection now go, unchecked by the Federal or local authorities, is an actual menace to the Republic—in no other civilized country would such preachments be permitted. It is not at all improbable that such publications could be suppressed right now by proper enforcement of existing laws; but whether or not such be the case the fact remains that sedition is openly preached and urged by foreign language, and some English language papers in the United States at this moment.

"'Mr. BRAND has done a patriotic service in the introduction of this measure, and it is to be hoped that the interest of Congress will not cease with its enactment, but will compel the responsible executive departments to protect the Nation and its Government more effectually than is done at present.'

"Let me say in conclusion that the present immigration law declares that persons who believe in and do any of the things inhibited by this bill shall be excluded from admission into the United States, and yet there is no existing law preventing these foreign-language newspapers, published in all portions of the earth, from being sent here and circulated in this country, whether the papers are friendly or unfriendly to America, and without 1 in 10,000, outside of their subscribers, knowing what they are advising and teaching.

NATIONAL PERIL

"This sort of situation involves the destiny of this Republic. It is a national peril and constitutes an uninterrupted menace to our form of government. The influence of these foreign-language papers reaches the islands of the seas and covers the inland possessions of the United States.

"Their influence, like the waves of the ocean, is ever moving and active, and flourishes in the blackness of night as well as in the sunlight of day.

"Silently, ceaselessly, and to some extent secretly and with unknown and unmeasured effect it does its work with uncurbed and relentless power. Such a situation is intolerable, and it is the imperative duty of Congress to remedy this evil."

ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], at the Lincoln Club of St. Paul, on February 13 last.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY KEEPS FAITH WITH LINCOLN

Fellow Republicans of the Lincoln Club of St. Paul, it is a great pleasure and privilege to come here from out of the East to do honor and pay tribute to Abraham Lincoln, the supremest character on the crowded canvas of the nineteenth century and the greatest Republican of all time.

At the outset of my remarks I want to congratulate the people of St. Paul for sending MELVIN MAAS, an ex-service man, to Congress. All things being equal, I believe that the voters should give preference to those who served in the armed forces of the United States during the World War, and particularly to those who risked their lives in the Air Service. It is my good fortune to serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs with Mr. MAAS, and I can truthfully say that he has shown, for a new Member, not only a high degree of intelligence but sound common sense and good judgment on the questions that have come before us. Moreover, during my service of seven years on the committee, he is, I believe, the first newly elected Member to be appointed to that committee. His knowledge of airplanes and their development has been exceedingly useful to both the committee and to the Congress. He has already made good in his first term.

I do not know whether the people of St. Paul appreciate the fact, but there have been more appointments to high Federal positions of prominent citizens of St. Paul than in New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia combined. To begin with, there is the distinguished Secretary of State, Frank B. Kellogg. Of course, I understand that appointment, as he was born in New York State. Then there is a galaxy of able public servants—Justice Pierce Butler, of the United States Supreme Court; Solicitor General William Mitchell; Robert Olds, Undersecretary of State; and Carl Schuneman, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. It is a political mystery in Washington how one city could secure so many important public offices, but all I can say to you is that appointments of men of such high caliber, regardless of party affiliations, is a service to the Republican Party that made them and a service to the people of this great Republic.

It is highly fitting that each year on the anniversary of his birth that Republican clubs all over this land should expound the life, career, and achievements of this immortal American who helped to found our party and with its aid preserved the Union and freed the slaves. Each year adds new laurels and renown to the name of Abraham Lincoln until to-day this humble, patient, kindly President personifies the spirit of our Republican form of government and what is best in the life and ideals of our country. The name of Lincoln signifies to every American schoolboy that the humblest in origin and wealth can rise to the heights of earthly power and renown through his own efforts.

Lincoln belongs to the country and to the world as one of its greatest characters, but we should not forget the indisputable fact that he was part and parcel of the Republican Party and the foremost expounder of its principles and doctrines. The early history of the Republican Party is synonymous with the political career of Abraham Lincoln. He received over a hundred votes for Vice President in 1856 when Fremont was nominated as President. As a Republican candidate he contested the senatorial election with Douglas, and although he lost, he added to the strength and growing prestige of the Republican Party by his inexorable logic in the celebrated joint debates with the "Little Giant." From 1860, when he was elected as the first Republican President, to 1865 when he was killed, Lincoln was the undisputed leader of the party as he is the soul of the Republican Party to-day.

My distinguished colleague, Representative HAROLD KNUTSON, the dean of the Minnesota delegation in Congress, has eloquently depicted to you one of the outstanding traits in Lincoln's character—that of simplicity, but there should be added to that these supplemental virtues, so strong in Lincoln, of honesty and truth. This triumvirate of virtues backed by natural intelligence and an indomitable will made success inevitable.

There was no more luck in Lincoln's political career than there was in the trans-Atlantic flight of Lindbergh, the adopted son of Minnesota. Both were prepared through the hard school of experience; both knew everything there was to know, even to the smallest details of their profession; and when obstacles suddenly confronted them they were able to steer the ship of state in one instance, and the airplane in the other, into a safe harbor where others less prepared would have failed. Lincoln and Lindbergh! What noble names for future Americans to conjure with and to inspire oncoming generations to do and dare. One the greatest character of the nineteenth century and the other the outstanding character so far of the twentieth century. Both pioneers from out of the West with the same dauntless courage and will to succeed. There is another remarkable comparison between these two great characters which I will state without attempting to draw a moral: Neither Lincoln nor Lindbergh ever smoked or took a drink. How many men do we know in good health who never smoked or drank?

I am informed that when Lincoln called for his first 75,000 volunteers the Governor of Minnesota was then in Washington and made the first offer to raise a regiment of infantry. It is certain that when further appeals for troops were made that Minnesota, the infant State of the Union at that time, sent more than her quota. From every village, hamlet, and town poured forth the pioneer blood of Minnesota to the famous tune of "We are coming, father Abraham, 300,000 strong from Mississippi's winding stream and from New England's shore."

The gallantry of the First Minnesota on the second day of Gettysburg is unsurpassed in our history. There should have been an American Tennyson to depict the heroic and forlorn charge when General Sickles was driven out of the peach orchard and his troops, almost surrounded, were striving to gain the Union lines on Cemetery Ridge; the First Minnesota was thrown against the flank of the onrushing and triumphant Confederates and saved the day by their heroic sacrifice, only 40 of the regiment coming out of the battle unwounded.

I am mindful of the fact that former Senator Knute Nelson, of Norwegian descent, served with the same loyalty in the Union forces as he did later in the Senate of the United States for many years. We in New York are still proud that a famous Swedish inventor, John Ericsson, made his home there and became one of our foremost citizens. When the war came, he, too, was prepared; he had already made many important inventions, improved steam engines, fire engines, and propellers for ships; but his greatest contribution was the ironclad Monitor, which defeated the Merrimac, saved the Union fleet, and revolutionized naval warfare. We Americans can never fully pay our debt of gratitude to that adopted son whose invention was an important factor in saving the Union. Lincoln himself was one of the first to realize the value of invention, and later to give Ericsson unstinted praise. Every man or woman of Swedish origin in America should read about the romantic life of Ericsson and feel pride in his contribution to the Union victory and the cause of Abraham Lincoln.

The freemen of the North, including the Scandinavians and Germans, were practically a unit for the Union and opposed to extension of the slave system. It was the Germans under Franz Sigel, of St. Louis, that saved Missouri for the Union, and we in the North should never forget their loyalty to their adopted flag when sedition was rife among native-born Americans and disunion facing the Government.

It is now almost a decade since the signing of the armistice that ended the World War. Is it not time that the passions and prejudices engendered in that conflict should be put definitely behind us? Is it not time that the spirit of hatred and hostility should cease and that all nations should strive together for international peace and good will?

The statute of limitations has long since run against enmity toward the German people. Our Government should welcome and befriend the German Republic which under wise leadership is becoming a potent force for international limitation of armament and world peace.

It is naturally true that many people of German ancestry in this country opposed our entrance into the World War; but once war was declared they were just as loyal as any other element of our population. The two outstanding American aces, Eddie Rickenbacker and Frank Luke, were of German origin, the parents of the former having been born in Switzerland and the latter in Germany.

Americans of German origin are among our most industrious and loyal citizens and have done much to build up our country. The greatness and prosperity of many of the western cities—Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, and St. Paul—is due in a large measure to the German population for their thrift and honest industry. Americans of German descent wherever found are forces for good citizenship and a bulwark against bolshevism and communism.

I favor the immediate return of the property seized in this country from German citizens during the war. Retention of such property amounts to confiscation and is a violation of the traditional policies of the United States from Alexander Hamilton to the present time. I am also in favor of placing a definite time limit on the payment of German reparations under the Dawes plan.

The war-debt settlements with England, France, and Italy on the basis of carefully considered capacity to pay are not only fair but exceedingly generous. The Italian debt settlement represents a reduction of 75 per cent of the war debt, and the French settlement which has not yet been agreed to by the French Government amounts to a 52 per cent reduction. There has never been a more liberal or generous settlement among nations. We do not claim we won the war, but we must not forget that American troops helped turn the tide from defeat to victory; yet we asked for nothing and got just what we asked for—nothing at all—no conquered lands, no territories, no indemnities or reparations except to pay for our army of occupation. There is no possible excuse for calling us "Uncle Shylock." We spent thirty-five billions and loaned ten billions more; yet, when we seek a partial payment, we meet with reproach from our former allies. All I want to say is that the position of the Government of the United States is fair, just, and represents unparalleled generosity in the recorded dealings between nations.

The State of Minnesota should indeed be proud that one of her adopted sons is America's ambassador of international good will, who brings about cordial and friendly relations between us and other nations where diplomats have failed. And another of her adopted sons is the Hon. Frank B. Kellogg, the Secretary of State, born in New York State, and now a leading citizen of St. Paul, who is taking a prominent part in framing a treaty to outlaw war and doing away as far as is humanly possible with man's inhumanity to man.

The text for my speech calls for an answer to the question, Has the Republican Party kept faith with Lincoln, and in order to answer it properly, let me read you the platform of Abraham Lincoln when he first ran for member of the Illinois Legislature:

"Friends and fellow citizens, I am plain Abe Lincoln. I have consented to become a candidate for the legislature. My political principles are like the old woman's dance—short and sweet. I believe in a United States bank. I believe in a protective tariff. I believe in a system of internal improvements, and I am for freedom of every human creature. If, on that platform, you can give me your suffrage, I shall be much obliged. If not, no harm done, and I remain, respectfully yours, Abe Lincoln."

This appeal was written when Lincoln was a Whig, long before the birth of the Republican Party, but it shows his consistency of principles. The national bank act was passed in 1863 under Lincoln's administration and has always been upheld by the Republican Party together with a resumption of specie payment, sound money, safety in finances, and economy in governmental expenditures.

Lincoln inaugurated and carried the most drastic measures for the protection of American industries ever conceived of up to his time. The Republican Party is not for a hidebound tariff or a Chinese wall. Its position is to afford a living protection as between the difference in the cost of production abroad and in the United States.

The Democratic Party has recently again proclaimed its faith in a revision of the tariff downward, and has evidently put it forward as one of the main campaign issues for 1928: The prosperity of our country has been built upon the protective principle which has made possible the American standard of wages and of living. Our wage earners are the best paid, best housed, best clothed, and most contented in the world. Revise the tariff downward and permit competition from the underpaid labor of Europe or the Far East and the economic supremacy of the United States will crumble and the disastrous days of 1914 will be revived with its soup kitchens and millions of unemployed. Revision of the tariff downward would not merely mean depression of wages but a general business chaos. Instead of revising the tariff downward I believe that the time has come when agricultural products should be given the same amount of protection as other industries. The farmers of both the East and the West have to buy in a protective market and sell in competition with the rest of the world.

The remedy is not in a downward revision of the tariff but in affording adequate protection on what farmers produce. They are entitled to the same consideration as any other protected industries—no more or no less. I see no sound reason why various farm products which are suffering from foreign competition, such as dairy products, eggs, vegetables, poultry, etc., should not be afforded adequate protection. It seems to me to be fair and just that the rates on agricultural products should be on a level comparable to the rates that are effective in other industries. I would be glad to vote for any practical, constructive farm-relief measure that would help the farmer to help himself and establish agriculture on an economic parity with other American industries.

Lincoln was an advocate of the land-grant colleges and signed the Morrell bill in 1863, and was outspoken in favor of both educational and internal improvements.

The Republican Party has always stood for internal improvements, and I am hopeful that the Federal Government will bear the financial burden in solving the problem of flood control on the Mississippi River, which drains half the States of the Union. It is not a local but a national issue.

The last of the five points in Lincoln's original platform for the assembly—freedom of every human creature—was settled after the expenditure of much blood and treasure in a terrible civil war and was written into the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. Lincoln repeatedly said that he had derived all his political sentiments from the Declaration of Independence. It was Lincoln, the emancipator, who by a stroke of his pen made effective that essential principle of the Declaration of Independence which reads: "All men are created equal and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; namely, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." He found the colored men and women chattels and he left them human souls. All men are created equal was no mere rhetoric to our first Republican President but a living, breathing, vibrant fact which must be safeguarded. Lincoln was the representative of the spirit of our democratic institutions and of that principle of equality of opportunity and of equal rights under the laws and the Constitution.

Born in a log cabin with only one room, a dirt floor, and no windows or doors, where summer rains and winter snows made life uncomfortable. He grew up amidst hardships helping his father to clear the forests or hiring out to neighbors. Until he studied law he never had six months of teaching all told. Abraham Lincoln was the embodiment and incarnation of the plain people. He knew and understood the thoughts and needs of the American people. He once said, "God must have loved the plain people because he made so many of them." One thing is sure, that Lincoln had faith in and loved the plain people, and they in turn had faith in and loved him. The Republican Party for 70 years or more has stood for equal opportunities to rich and poor, and agreed with Lincodn that no man should be discriminated against on account of race, creed, or color. There is not a principle in the Republican Party to-day that is out of harmony with or inconsistent with the teachings and character of Abraham Lincoln. The Republican Party could well afford when in doubt to go back to the people and learn from them. There you will always find abundant common sense and patriotism.

The people of America are weary of extremes; they have no use for the agitator or demagogue, and on the other hand they see through selfish interests, foreign or domestic, that would despoil the Government and undermine the confidence of the people in our free institutions. The common sense of the plain people, who in peace create the wealth and in war carry the muskets of the Republic, is an infallible guide. It was the source of Abraham Lincoln's wisdom.

It must be almost inconceivable to you virile Americans of the West, but even at this moment successful business men, heads of great industrial organizations, bankers, and intellectuals are returning from short visits to Italy, where they met Mussolini and come home extolling and praising that temporary dictatorship and belittling and minimizing our own form of government. Mussolini may have saved Italy from the horrors of communism. Fascism may be the kind of government needed in Italy, but it is scarcely any different from the dictatorship of Julius Cæsar 2,000 years ago. It is the negation and denial of our republican form of government. It is a repudiation of government by the consent of the governed and all popular government. It is the rule by force and the bayonet and the denial of all civil liberties, the right to vote, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, and of assembly.

Mussolini says our democratic form of government has been a failure. Wherein has it failed? Thanks to Abraham Lincoln and the Republican Party, we are a united and prosperous country of over one hundred millions of contented people who are free and equal and whose civil rights are guaranteed by the Constitution. In spite of Mussolini and fascism in Italy and Stalin and communism in Russia denying popular government, the spirit of Abraham Lincoln is marching on. When he first spoke those immortal lines at Gettysburg, "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth," there were only a few republics in the world. To-day there are only a few remaining monarchies, and they have yielded to popular government. The picture of Abraham Lincoln may be found by the traveler in the humblest abode in Japan or in the farthest outskirts of China, and underneath the words: "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is the dream and the hope of the oppressed and the struggling masses the world over, and Lincoln is the incarnation of that sentiment.

Our friendly enemies, the Democrats, recently at their Jackson Day dinner vied with each other in denouncing, abusing, and vilifying the Republican Party as responsible for graft and corruption in the Federal Government. I take this opportunity to deny the charge as absurd and false and challenge them to specify a single act of graft or corruption under the Coolidge administration. Every thinking American knows that President Coolidge stands on the mountain tops for rugged honesty and incorruptibility, and that no man guilty of dishonesty or wrongdoing, whether he be Republican or Democrat, can hope for any favor or protection from the present administration. I deplore these wild charges and raising of hobgoblins of graft where none exists, because they undermine the faith of the American people in their form of government. On the other hand, I deplore the personal attacks made by Republicans upon Gov. Alfred E. Smith, who with the exception of waste and extravagance in his administration—saving at the spigot and letting out at the bunghole—has made a good record as Governor of New York State. Governor Smith, if nominated for the Presidency by the Democrats, will be beaten, but not through personal attacks or abuse, but by selling to the public the glorious record and achievements of the Republican Party for peace, progress, and prosperity ever since the days of Lincoln.

We must not forget that the Republican Party was originally composed of many different elements—Whigs, Union Democrats, Free Soilers, and Abolitionists. To-day we are the strongest national party and there is ample room for varying opinions arising on such controversial questions as prohibition, farm relief, or taxation. The Republican Party is big enough and broad enough to hold within its ranks every American who believes in the principles and doctrines enunciated by Abraham Lincoln. I trust I am not transgressing the bounds of political ethics when I say that I hope the great State of Minnesota will soon again take its proper place as a banner Republican stronghold by sending another Republican Senator to Washington to uphold the ideals and the party of Lincoln.

Let us unite for the common good, with charity for all and malice toward none. Let us welcome back the prodigal sons within our ranks. There rests upon all Republicans in this presidential year of 1928 a solemn duty to dedicate a portion of his or her time, talents, and energy to upholding Republican principles and electing Republican candidates. I have an abiding confidence in the future of the Republican Party. I have an abiding faith in the judgment and patriotism of the American people. They may be temporarily led astray by false leaders, but they will always return to true principles and belief in party responsibility. Let us highly resolve that Lincoln shall not have died in vain. His work is not finished, and it will not be finished until his conception of popular government and the rights of the people shall be accepted by every civilized country. Ours is the only national party of service, of constructive legislation, of sound money, of a protective tariff, of a square deal and a full dinner pail for labor, and of practical economy and wise statesmanship.

The Republican Party had its birth in the great West, and took its first three presidential candidates, Frémont, Lincoln, and Grant, from Western States. What could be fairer or more appropriate if the choice should again fall on a Republican of the West to lead our national ticket, like Lincoln and Grant, to overwhelming victory? We look upon a house no longer divided and upon a united and prosperous country which is only in the morning of its glorious destiny. Let us give thanks on this anniversary that we are American citizens and belong to the party that has kept faith with Abraham Lincoln. Let us rededicate ourselves to the proposition that a government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth, because it is the fairest, safest, soundest, most honorable, and best government devised by the mind of man.

AMENDING THE FOREIGN SERVICE BUILDINGS ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10166) to amend the Foreign Service buildings act, 1926.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I think this bill is one of considerable importance. I understand the Committee on Foreign Service is to have an early Calendar Wednesday, and I prefer that it should go over until that time.

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. The bill is twofold. Under the Foreign Service buildings act the commission has authority to purchase sites and construct buildings, but it has no power to exchange properties. We are confronted with this situation: In Yokohama we own a site. The building was destroyed by the earthquake. It is situated adjacent to buildings owned by the Japanese Government, and they are anxious to secure it. They have offered us a site twice as large and much better located for our purposes for the one which we now own. We have the plans prepared for the building and are anxious to ask for bids. This amendment increases powers of the commission so that it can exchange property as well as purchase it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the bill went no further than to authorize this particular exchange I would have no objection to it, but it is much broader than that, it authorizes the general authority to exchange, and I think to sell——

Mr. PORTER. No; not to sell. The reason that it gives general authority is because of the situation in Habana, Cuba. There we will probably have to exchange because the present embassy has turned out to be unsuitable.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I confess I have not had time to study the bill very carefully, but it has another objectionable feature, and that is that while the expenditure mentioned in the bill is not large it authorizes that the expenditure shall be without regard to the civil service or without regard to the reclassification act. I think that is a mistake and is unnecessary. For the present I shall have to object to the bill.

SALE OF LAND IN PHILADELPHIA TO THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD CO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5476) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. a tract of land situated in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROMJUE. Reserving the right to object, I want to inquire something about the value of this property. Inasmuch as the bill sets out that this property is to be sold to a specific company, what information has the committee as to the amount of money they can get?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the gentleman that they will pay the regular price. This has the recommendation of the Secretary of War and has been gone into in detail. It is satisfactory to everybody and is absolutely necessary, because the road wants to make changes in its tracks.

Mr. ROMJUE. The bill says it is to be sold to this specific company. Inasmuch as you sell it to this company, the committee ought to make inquiry as to the amount of money they are going to receive. Can the gentleman tell us the amount that the purchasing company are willing to pay for it?

Mr. HUGHES. I can not; but it has been gone into and is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I can give the gentleman some information about the bill. The bill provides that before the sale is made an appraisal shall be had under the direction of the Secretary of War and that the railroad company shall pay the cost of the appraisal and that the sale price shall not be less than the appraised value of the property.

Mr. ROMJUE. I do not see any particular merit——

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am not interested in the passage of the bill. I am bringing to the attention of the gentleman the fact that there is a safeguard in the bill.

Mr. ROMJUE. And that means that the railroad company will appraise it and then buy it?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No; the Secretary of War would cause an appraisal to be made under his direction.

Mr. ROMJUE. The bill does not say who shall appraise it?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No; but it is to be done under the direction of the Secretary of War. He would select the appraisers.

Mr. ROMJUE. It seems to me the committee should make some inquiry as to the value of the property before selling it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am not a member of the committee, or urging the passage of the bill. There is that safeguard in the bill, and it provides, as I have said, that it shall be appraised under the direction of the Secretary of War and the price paid shall not be less than the appraised value of the property.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman from Texas usually makes a very careful investigation of matters, and I would like to know whether the bill meets with his approval?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I have no objection to the bill with the safeguard. I am not criticizing the gentleman from Missouri, because he is within his rights in objecting to the bill, if he does object to it.

Mr. DENISON. It is the custom of the Secretary of War to appoint competent men to make appraisals of property.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this bill received very careful investigation by the committee, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] put these safeguards in the bill. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] is unable to be present this afternoon, as he is attending a hearing before the committee on Muscle Shoals.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman know whether or not any member of the committee made any effort to find out the actual cash value of this property which is sought to be sold?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Oh, yes. The subcommittee did, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] had this amendment put in. It has to be appraised, as millions and millions of dollars worth have been appraised heretofore, under the direction of the War Department. They have appraisers that they appoint themselves, disinterested people.

Mr. ROMJUE. And the gentleman from Texas is satisfied?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I have no objection to this being reported, and I have no objection to its being passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell, upon such terms and conditions as he considers advisable, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or its nominee, a tract of land containing 1.5512 acres, more or less, said tract now forming a part of War Department reservation at Twenty-first Street and Oregon Avenue, being the westerly end of the reservation, situate in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, which said tract is no longer needed for military purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf, with and to the said the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or its nominee, any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate such sale; the proceeds of the sale of the property hereinbefore designated to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the fund known as the military posts construction fund.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "fund" insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have the said tract appraised at the expense of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall not sell said tract for a less consideration than the appraised value hereinbefore referred to."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NEZ PERCES INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, some time ago unanimous consent was given to pass over Calendar No. 228 (H. R. 8110), withdrawing from entry the northwest quarter section 12, township 30 north, range 19 east, Montana meridian. I ask that we now return to that and take up the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the northwest quarter section 12, township 30 north, range 19 east, Montana meridian, is hereby withdrawn from all forms of entry under the public land laws of the United States, for the purpose of preserving the site of the battle between Nez Perces Indians under Chief Joseph and the command of Nelson A. Miles.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, page 1, after the word "Miles," add the words "and the area is hereby created a national monument."

Page 2, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the State of Montana, or Blaine County, Mont., or citizens of Montana, or either or any of them, for the care and upkeep of the herein-described lands."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the department has no objection to the bill as introduced, but it does object to the amendment creating a national monument. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman from Montana to have that amendment disagreed to?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced by myself without that amendment. The amendment was put on by the committee. It is entirely agreeable to me to have the committee amendment disagreed to, because I know that it could be made a national park by presidential direction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

The committee amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the second committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENABLING MOTHERS OF DECEASED SOLDIERS TO VISIT EUROPE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5494) to enable the mothers and unmarried widows of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American forces interred in the cemeteries of Europe to make a pilgrimage to these cemeteries.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, in cooperation with the American National Red Cross, to arrange for pilgrimages to cemeteries in Europe wherein are interred the remains of persons in the military or naval forces of the United States who died during the World War. Such pilgrimages may be made at the expense of the United States under the following conditions:

First. Invitations to make such pilgrimages shall be extended in the name of the United States to the mothers and unmarried widows of the deceased.

Second. Invitations shall be for only one pilgrimage by each mother or unmarried widow.

Third. Such pilgrimage shall be made at any time during the period of three years from July 1, 1928, to June 30, 1931, inclusive.

Fourth. Pilgrimages shall be made in groups numbering approximately 500 each.

Fifth. Each group shall be permitted to remain in Europe for approximately two weeks, but in no case longer than three weeks, unless return transportation shall be unavailable in the meantime.

Sixth. The Government owned or chartered vessels shall be used for transportation at sea.

Seventh. First-class accommodations shall be furnished each mother or unmarried widow and to such Red Cross attendants as may be selected to accompany any pilgrimage for the entire distance traveled at sea or on land and while sojourning in Europe or awaiting transportation in the United States.

Eighth. The Interstate Commerce Commission shall grant permission to railroads and other carriers of passengers for hire under its jurisdiction to furnish transportation free or at reduced rates to each mother or unmarried widow and to such Red Cross attendants as may be selected to accompany any pilgrimage.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to defray all expenses of the pilgrimage, as authorized by regulations approved by the President.

SEC. 3. The money herein authorized to be appropriated shall be disbursed by such disbursing officer or officers of the Army as may be designated by the Secretary of War. All disbursements shall be audited by the Secretary of War, whose certificate that any such disbursement is authorized by the act and/or by the regulations of the President shall be final and conclusive on the General Accounting Office and shall entitle the officer making the disbursement to credit therefor in his accounts without further evidence or vouchers.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of War shall certify to the General Accounting Office, for debiting on the proper account, any charge against any disbursing officer for any loss or deficiency arising in his accounts under this act. Said certificate shall set forth that it includes all changes made up to its date and not previously certified and that the officer has had a reasonable opportunity to be heard and has not been relieved of responsibility. The effect of such certificate when received shall be the same as if the facts therein set forth had been ascertained by the General Accounting Office in accounting.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, strike out:

Fourth. Pilgrimages shall be made in groups numbering approximately 500 each: and insert:

"Fourth. (a) For the purpose of such pilgrimages passports shall be issued by the Department of State to such mothers, unmarried widows, and Red Cross attendants as may be selected to accompany such pilgrimage, who are citizens of the United States, and travel documents to those who are aliens, without fee for either document.

"(b) Such alien mothers, unmarried widows, and Red Cross attendants shall be permitted to return and be granted admission to the United States without regard to any law, convention, or treaty relating to the immigration or exclusion of aliens."

Page 3, line 23, after the word "war," insert "under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some one in respect to the committee amendments. The committee amendments provide that while these gold-star mothers shall go over, they shall go over in groups. I assume that that will not destroy the real purpose of the original bill, which is to provide a trip at Government expense for the mothers whose sons sleep in France, so that they may visit the cemeteries where loved ones lie buried. I think this is a meritorious measure, and I hope that it will pass the House without any objection. I have had opportunity to visit the battle fields of France and the cemeteries there. I know that these gold-star mothers ought to have the opportunity of paying a pilgrimage to where their loved ones sleep, and that they will be glad to embrace an opportunity which a grateful Government and a grateful people shall extend to them through this agency.

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF BATTLE FIELDS—TRAVELING EXPENSES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 235) to authorize the payment of travel expenses from appropriations for investigations and surveys of battle fields.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That mileage of officers of the Army and actual expenses of civilian employees traveling on duty in connection with the studies, surveys, and field investigations of battle fields shall be paid from the appropriations made from time to time to meet the expenses for these purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WIND RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 356) to amend section 2 of the act of March 3, 1905, entitled "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians residing on the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in the State of Wyoming, and to make appropriations to carry the same into effect."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of chapter 1452 of the Statutes of the Fifty-eighth Congress (33 Stat. L. 1021), being "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians on the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in the State of Wyoming, and to make appropriations to carry the same into effect," as amended by Joint Resolution No. 12 of the Fifty-ninth Congress (34 Stat. 825) and chapter 197 of the Statutes of the Sixtieth Congress (35 Stat. L. 650), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the time for making entry and payment for mineral lands located under the act of March 3, 1905, shall be extended for the period of 10 years from July 1, 1927, and any right, title, or interest in any such mineral lands acquired heretofore under the provisions of the said act of March 3, 1905; and the mineral land and mining laws and regulations of the United States, and not perfected by entry and payment, but subsisting in full force and effect in so far as compliance with the requirements of the said mineral land and mining laws and regulations are concerned, shall, notwithstanding the fact that five years may have elapsed since the location of any claim, continue in full force and effect, without any diminution whatsoever of the right, title, or interest on account of failure to make entry and payment within five years from the date of the location of such claim: Provided, That the extension of time hereby granted shall not apply to mineral lands of coal, oil, and gas: And provided further, That this act shall not be construed as reviving any placer mineral location which has lost its validity because of failure to comply with the Federal and State laws."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MENOMINEE RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House Joint Resolution (H. J. Res. 176) granting consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of Wisconsin and the State of Michigan for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a highway bridge across the Menominee River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the consent of Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, given to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to enter into the agreement or compact executed by the State highway commissioner of the State of Wisconsin and the Highway Commission of the State of Michigan pursuant to authority of chapter 87 of the Wisconsin statutes, and the authority of act 354 of the public acts of 1925 and special act 98 of the public acts of 1927 of the State of Michigan, and each and every part and article thereof be, and the same is hereby, ratified, approved, and confirmed: Provided, That nothing therein contained shall be constructed as impairing or in any manner affecting any right or jurisdiction of the United States in and over the region which forms the subject of said agreement; which agreement is in words and figures as follows:

AGREEMENT—MENOMINEE-MARINETTE BRIDGE AT BRIDGE STREET RELOCATION WISCONSIN HIGHWAY COMMISSION WITH MICHIGAN STATE HIGHWAY COMMISSIONER

This agreement, executed this 14th day of January, 1927, by and between Frank F. Rogers, State highway commissioner of the State of Michigan, with offices at Lansing Mich., party of the first part; and the Wisconsin Highway Commission, with offices at Madison, Wis., party of the second part:

Witnesseth that:

Whereas the existing interstate bridge, crossing the Menominee River at Bridge Street and joining the municipalities of Marinette, Wis., and Menominee, Mich., is in an unsafe condition and requires early reconstruction; and

Whereas a proper plan for reconstruction involves a relocation and includes a grade separation and expensive approach fills and properly extends as a project from the center of Dunlap Square in the city of Marinette to the center line of Ogden Avenue in the city of Menominee; and

Whereas the State boundary line, as determined by the United States Supreme Court in a late decision, lies entirely north of the proposed actual structure spanning the Menominee River, and thereby complicates the respective responsibilities of the two parties hereto both as regards construction and maintenance obligations.

Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed:

1. That this project shall, subject to changes to be hereafter mutually agreed upon as signified by joint approval of all subsequent plans and estimates, be built in accord with the preliminary plans prepared by the first party and marked "Exhibit A" and approved by the second party and hereto attached and considered as an integral part of this agreement, and that the detailed plans and specifications for the project shall be prepared by the first party subject to the approval of the second party.

2. That each party shall either directly or through the respective cities, townships, and counties within which the work is situated, furnish and bear the full cost of all right of way and abutting and property damages arising from or necessary to the execution of the plans as they may be finally, mutually, and jointly approved by the said parties, as applying to property situated on the side of the existing interstate boundary line subject to the jurisdiction of the respective parties hereto or the respective cities, townships, and counties within the respective States.

3. That aside from the stipulations stated in item 2 above, the entire cost of fully executing the project shall be borne equally by the respective parties hereto, and that to this end any contribution or assessment, to be hereafter paid by the Chicago & North Western Railway Co. and/or by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. and/or by any other public utility company affected by the project, shall be credited equally to the shares of the parties hereto, and, further, that any contribution or assessment which may be arranged by either party to be paid by a county, township, or municipality within the respective States shall be guaranteed by the respective parties hereto, and that all payments and transactions in the handling of the construction of this project shall be directly between the parties hereto, each of whom agrees to act as its own collecting agent in dealing with the other contributing parties in their respective States.

4. All contracts shall be let jointly by the first and second parties hereto, who shall jointly constitute the first party to all such contracts and no contracts shall be let until after formal approval of awards by each party. The work of construction shall be administered under the joint supervision of the first and second parties as first party of all of the aforesaid contracts to be let under the terms of this agreement, but the second party hereto agrees that its inspection and supervision shall be administered through the representatives of the first party and not through direct dealings with the contractors, and that any matters of dispute in regard to the administration of the contracts shall be adjusted jointly by the bridge engineers of the respective parties hereto. Each party may retain such engineering assistance in supervising the work as it may deem necessary and the cost of such engineering, including office work and administration as may become necessary, shall be considered a legitimate charge to the project. Estimates to the contractor shall be paid direct by each party hereto, each in the amount of 50 per cent of the total estimated amounts due under the provisions of the specifications of the first party and as approved by the second party, all estimates being prepared by the first party at two week intervals or thereabouts, approved by the first party and submitted to the second party for approval, the second party making payment direct to the contractor on approval of estimates and the first party likewise making payment to the contractor on receipt of copies of the estimates after being approved by the second party. Authorizations for extra work will be handled in the same manner as the original contracts. The engineering costs on this project will be considered as including expenditures made by each party prior to the date of the execution of this agreement as well as all such costs subsequent thereto.

5. The work to be covered by this agreement is further indicated in an approximate preliminary estimate of cost known as Exhibit B, based on Exhibit A, attached herewith and considered as an integral part of this agreement. This estimate is for preliminary budget purposes, it being agreed that the shares of the respective parties shall be based upon the actual cost of the work.

6. For the purpose of future maintenance it is hereby agreed that the first and second parties shall, upon completion of this project, each maintain that portion of the project (or bear the expense of doing so) which lies north and south respectively of the center of the third span measured from the north end of the river structure.

7. That the first and second parties shall, through their respective United States Senators and Congressmen from the districts within which the project is situated, take the necessary steps to secure the approval of the United States Congress at the 1928 session, authorizing the construction of said project, and also the necessary approval of the United States War Department.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have on the day first above written caused this agreement to be executed by their proper authorities.

FOR THE STATE OF MICHIGAN,
By FRANK F. ROGERS.
FOR THE STATE OF WISCONSIN,
By WISCONSIN HIGHWAY COMMISSION.
(Signed) C. R. WEYMOUTH.

Approved as to form,

LINCOLN E. BRADT.

Approved December 1, 1927.

(Signed) C. A. MELICK.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "and each and every part and article thereof be, and the same is hereby, ratified, approved, and confirmed."

Page 8, line 6, after the word "Rogers," add "State highway commissioner"; and on line 10, after the word "Weymouth," add "secretary"; and on line 14, after the word "Bradt," add "legal adviser"; and on line 17, after the word "Melick," add "bridge engineer, Michigan State highway department."

Line 19 add:

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this resolution is hereby expressly reserved."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PUYALLUP INDIAN CEMETERY, TACOMA, WASH.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 173) to provide funds for the upkeep of the Puyallup Indian Cemetery at Tacoma, Wash.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to set aside on the books of his office under an appropriate designation the sum of $25,000 from the tribal funds of the Puyallup Indians accruing under the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L. 633), as a permanent trust fund at 4 per cent interest, to be credited semiannually and used only for the upkeep of the Puyallup Indian Cemetery in the city of Tacoma, Wash., under the direction of and in conformity with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby authorized to withdraw said interest from the Treasury of the United States for this purpose.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 2, after the word "Interior," strike out the remainder of lines 2, 3, and 4 and insert in lieu thereof the words "upon appropriation."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WISCONSIN POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7207) to appropriate treaty funds due the Wisconsin Pottawotamie Indians.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. I move to consider in lieu of the House bill the Senate bill, S. 1759. It is identical except that it reads "authorize to appropriate" instead of "appropriate."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to substitute S. 1759 for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,839, being the unappropriated balance of the total amount of $447,339 due the Wisconsin Pottawatomie Indians of Wisconsin and Michigan under the treaty of September 27, 1833 (7 Stat. L. 442), and the act of June 25, 1864 (13 Stat. L. 172), as set out in House Document No. 830, Sixtieth Congress, first session: Provided, That the unexpended balances of $37,044.55 in the appropriations made for said Indians by the acts of May 18, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 156), May 25, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 589), and June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 29), and which have reverted to the Treasury, are hereby reappropriated; and that said sums, together with the unexpended balance of $4,347.73 in the appropriation for the purchase of land for said Indians made by the act of June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L. 102), shall be subject to expenditures for their benefit or payment to them, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LEAVITT. I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEAVITT: Page 1, line 3, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "hereby," insert "authorized to be," and in line 11 strike out the word "expenditures" and insert in lieu thereof the word "expenditure," and amend the title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the House bill H. R. 7207 will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HOSPITAL AT FORT BIDWELL INDIAN SCHOOL, CALIFORNIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8542) to provide for the construction of a hospital at the Fort Bidwell Indian School, California.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I wish the gentleman would withhold his objection and allow the bill to be passed over without prejudice. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and also the following bill, Calendar No. 273, namely, the bill H. R. 8543.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bills he named be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT], I want it understood that my objection was withdrawn.

CERTAIN LANDS IN CALIFORNIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8898) to provide for restoration to the public domain of certain lands in the State of California which are now reserved for Indian allotment purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public lands in townships 4 and 5 south, range 31 east, and townships 4, 5, and 6 south, range 32 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, temporarily reserved from settlement, entry, sale, or other disposition by Executive order of May 9, 1912, for allotment to Paiute and other Indians, be, and they are hereby, restored to the public domain subject to the provisions of Public Resolution No. 29, approved February 14, 1920 (41 Stat. 434), as amended by Public Resolutions Nos. 36 and 79, approved January 21 and December 28, 1922 (42 Stat. 358, 1067), respectively, on dates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WITHDRAWAL OF LANDS IN INYO COUNTY, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9037) to provide for the permanent withdrawal of certain lands in Inyo County, Calif., for Indian use.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands in California be, and they are hereby, withdrawn from entry, sale, or other disposition and set aside for the Indians of Indian Ranch, Inyo County, Calif.: Provided, That the withdrawal hereby authorized shall be subject to any prior valid right of any persons to the lands described: Township 21 south, range 44 east, northwest quarter section 3 (surveyed), northwest quarter northeast quarter section 3 (unsurveyed); township 20 south, range 44 east, southeast quarter section 33 (unsurveyed); northwest quarter and northwest quarter southwest quarter section 34 (unsurveyed); of the Mount Diablo meridian in California, containing 560 acres, more or less.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GOLD-STAR MOTHERS

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. O'CONNELL] may be permitted to extend his remarks on the bill, H. R. 5494, known as the gold star mothers' bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNELL] be permitted to extend his remarks on the bill indicated. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, in speaking and pleading for the passage of this bill, H. R. 5494, I find myself engaged in a work that has consistently occupied my attention for the past seven years. I rejoice with the Members of the House who I am sure are unanimously prepared to vote for its adoption; that the Committee on Military Affairs so promptly reported in its favor, thus placing it on the high road to easy passage. The evidence presented before the committee by Mrs. Burling, of the Gold Star Mothers' Association, by Mrs. NORTON, our distinguished colleague of New Jersey, as also by the other Members of the House so impressed the committee that it took the unusual methods of making a favorable report forthwith.

Our colleague, Mr. BUTLER, is to be commended for the energy he has shown in advocating the bill.

We should all rejoice that it will be our good fortune as Members of this body to have helped to pass this bill that will permit these glorious women to visit the sanctified resting places of their heroic dead in the cemeteries of the countries they redeemed and reclaimed by the supreme sacrifice upon the altar of devotion. The invasion of Europe by these splendid mothers shall be one of peace, concord, and good will, which will go far to cement our friendship with the allied nations across the sea with whom our boys fought the fight of victory. Let me quote the great plea made by Mrs. Mathilda A. Burling, national representative of the Gold Star Mothers' Association of America, Richmond Hill, N. Y., at the hearings before the committee:

At the outset I desire to express my great appreciation to Congressman BUTLER, of Pennsylvania, not only for his kindness in introducing this bill but for the spirited and generous manner in which he has pressed it for consideration. Also on behalf of my associates I desire to thank your chairman for his courtesy in affording us this hearing and to thank as well Congressman O'CONNELL and Congressman BOYLAN, of New York, for their help and cooperation.

You no doubt realize how anxious the gold-star mothers are to visit their sons' graves. Have you gentlemen stopped to think and consider what America would have done if it had not been for these mothers? Not alone the gold-star mothers, but the mothers who gave their sons to serve their country. It was the mothers who suffered to bring these boys into the world, who cared for them in sickness and health, and it was our flesh and blood that enriched the foreign soil.

Can you picture the anxiety of these mothers watching at the door for the postman every day for the little letter that was to come from her boy, and the agony and suspense when those letters stopped, and then only to be replaced with a telegram from Washington informing her that her boy was wounded or missing or dead?

Many of these boys were just in the bloom of life, just going into manhood. Some of these mothers lost one, some two, and some three, and some four.

I would like to take my case for example. On February 13 it will be the tenth anniversary of the death of my boy. He was my only child. To me he was only a child, only 17 years old when he went across. He was killed at the time when to me life was sweetest, only to have been turned to sorrow at the receipt of the dreadful telegram announcing his death.

There were many nurses who were with the boys when they died. They had informed mothers that the boys' lips were sealed with the words "Mother, my mother." Oh, what a death, to be calling for his mother!

Can a Government ever repay us for our loss? The cost of this pilgrimage would be very little for the Government to do for us. It would only be fitting to send us across this year, this being the tenth anniversary of our great sacrifice, and I am sure it would not be asking too much. May we not include the mothers of the unknown dead on this trip? There are so few. The Government has done such good work in identifying the bodies. I believe there are only about 300 left. What a comfort it would be to let these mothers kneel at one of the graves marked with a marble cross with the words "Here lies an honored American soldier known but to God," and be comforted, thinking it might be her boy!

Gentlemen, think of those dear, sweet mothers now on in years. This might be granting their last wish. Many have died with a broken heart. Can those who remain not be given this comfort of going over? Does it not seem a shame that the mothers have to beg for that privilege which should have been offered them?

I, personally, do not believe there will be 30,000 mothers who will want to go. What a wonderful peace mission it would be if such a group of mothers could be sent abroad as is proposed in the bill. I believe it would bring the countries closer together than any act that could ever be suggested. This, I am sure, will be the wish of every gold-star mother. These women, the mothers of those dead, I am sure, are pleased at the idea proposed in the bill to have the arrangements under the auspices of the Red Cross. There is no doubt that the passage of this bill will have the support of the press and the public of the United States and the world in recognition of the sacrifices we have made for our country and the world.

And I would like to bring to the attention of the House the following splendid plea made to the committee in a letter to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], from the distinguished junior Senator from my State [Mr. WAGNER], which brings the subject home to all our hearts:

Hon. JOHN J. BOYLAN,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Some time ago I had occasion to express myself in reference to the proposal which is now embodied in S. 2681 and H. R. 5494.

I am sending you a copy of my statement:

"During the negotiations for the settlement of the various war loans we largely overlooked a great debt, long past-due and payable to our own kin. It is a debt of honor. We owe it to the widows and orphaned mothers whose loved ones lie in the war cemeteries of Europe to afford them the meager solace of a visit to these holy graves. These wearers of the gold star have been deprived of the assistance, companionship, and love of their sons and husbands. The national emergency required it. But no cause is served when we further deprive them of the consolation of paying their last tribute. Legislation should forthwith be framed for the conveyance of every war-bereaved mother and widow to the grave side of him who carried her love across the sea and sacrificed it for the safety of our Nation.

"The expense of transporting approximately 30,000 persons is comparatively trifling. Had the brave boys who lie in France, Belgium, and England survived the Great War, the Government would have brought them back home to their wives and mothers. Let not this Nation profit through the supreme sacrifice of its heroes. Such a holy pilgrimage to the American shrines in Europe would be a great living and moving monument to peace. The ranks of mothers and sweethearts would constitute a new expeditionary force and first line of defense for peace.

"Europe would see us in a new light, not as fighting doughboys, nor as gallant legionnaires, but as a nation of homes and families whose members are capable of the most pious sentiments.

"The transports of war must be turned into transports of consolation for those whom victory or reparation could never compensate. The soil of Verdun and Flanders now treasures their love; it should act promptly to give effect to this proposal, and I will do everything in my power to bring it about."

Yours very truly, ROBERT F. WAGNER.

Mr. Speaker, this bill will pass, it must pass, because it is just, because it is human. Its passage will have the approval and the applause of the American people and the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7908) to authorize the granting of leave to ex-service men and women to attend the annual convention of the United Spanish War Veterans and Auxiliary in Habana, Cuba, in 1928.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman from Michigan withhold his objection until I suggest an amendment which I would like to offer if the bill is permitted to be considered?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The bill is exactly like the bill which was passed for the ex-service men, but the intention of this bill is to allow this privilege of attending the convention only to the veterans of the Spanish-American War. Therefore if the bill is considered I expect to offer an amendment to strike out the words "to ex-service men and women" and insert "to veterans of the Spanish-American War." There is no reason why this privilege should be extended to any but those people and that limits the scope of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill is one to which it is difficult to object, as the gentleman knows. On the other hand, I have not been able to see any reason for it. The gentleman urges the meeting of the Legion in Paris as a precedent. Of course, this is a meeting of Spanish-American War veterans in Cuba. There is that similarity, but it lacks, however, the same travel requirements. This came from the gentleman's committee. Let me ask the gentleman: Does he contemplate or is it his theory that this precedent should ever obtain for any meeting held in this country?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; nor do I conceive of any event in the immediate future that would give any justification for the following of any precedent that might possibly be deemed established by this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. If meetings in this country are not to be held to benefit by this precedent, of course, there is not much danger in the future, because there will not be many meetings outside of the country. The undesirable feature of it is that while none of them will probably take over a month in attending this meeting, including the trip to Panama, they will, however, have two months' leave, and it is disorganizing to any organization or any business to have employees away for two months at a time. Furthermore, it allows them to take their leave in advance; but in view of the gentleman's statement restricting it to veterans of the Spanish-American War and his statement restricting such action to meetings abroad, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the heads of the executive departments and independent establishments of the Government and the municipal government of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized to grant, in their discretion, extended leave not to exceed 60 days in the calendar year 1928 to ex-service men and women for the sole purpose of attending the annual convention of the United Spanish War Veterans and auxiliaries in Habana, Cuba: Provided, however, That this statute shall not be construed to modify the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1893, the act approved May 23, 1908, and the act approved February 28, 1925, limiting the annual leave which may be granted with pay to 15 or 30 days in any one year, except that any portion of the 15 or 30 days' leave not granted or used during the calendar year 1927, or the fiscal year 1928, may be allowed to accumulate and be pyramided for the purpose herein specified in addition to the 15 or 30 days' leave with pay in the calendar year 1928 or the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: On page 1, line 8, strike out the words "ex-service men and women" and insert in lieu thereof the words "veterans of the Spanish-American War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "ex-service men and women" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "veterans of the Spanish-American War."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PENSIONS FOR COMMISSIONED UNITED STATES DEPUTY MARSHALS FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5709) granting a pension to the regularly commissioned United States deputy marshals of the United States District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, including the Indian Territory, now the State of Oklahoma, and to their widows and dependent children.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. HOOPER, and Mr. TILSON objected.

PUBLIC PRINTER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6669), fixing the salary of the Public Printer and the Deputy Public Printer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania tell me something about this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I object.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Texas to withhold his objection in order that I may make a very brief statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object for this reason: There are over 100 bureaus here the chiefs of which, by the classification act, get salaries of $7,500 a year. If you increase the salary of this bureau chief, you set a precedent for other bureau chiefs coming in here and demanding similar increases. It is in the protection of the Treasury, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has to look after, that I object.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS BY AIR TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7213), to grant authority to the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for the transportation of mails by air to foreign countries and insular possessions of the United States for periods of not more than 10 years, and to pay for such service from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails at fixed rates per pound or per mile, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] if he has the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that several members of the committee, including the gentleman, had a talk with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MADDEN] with reference to the provision that the award, interpretation, and administration of the contract are entirely within the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General, the President, and the courts. We agreed to amend that provision by striking out the words "and administration," as suggested by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and I have an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. With the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] that he has remedied the difficulty which I thought existed. I would not object.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter should come up on a regular legislative day. It is a matter of much importance and I shall object,

Mr. KELLY. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; I do not think we should consider legislation of this particular character under unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLY. If the gentleman will withhold his objection a moment——

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes; I will certainly allow the gentleman to make any statement he cares to make about it.

Mr. KELLY. This is a very important measure, I admit. Time is the essence of the matter. The purpose is to give the Postmaster General authority to contract for the carrying of foreign mail by air at certain fixed rates per pound. It happens that in Central and South America companies financed by European capital are being organized at the present time and are asking concessions of those governments. The United States Government at the present time can secure permission to carry this mail, if it acts within a reasonable time; but if it delays too long we will lose the opportunity.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Does the gentleman mean we lose the opportunity to secure contractors?

Mr. KELLY. I mean if we allow this matter to go for any considerable time, foreign companies will have concessions from South and Central American countries and it will embarrass us seriously.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a good deal of effort being made by German aviation companies to get the right to control the aviation business between the United States and South American Republics. They wanted the right to cross the Panama Canal and a number of other things which, of course, would be very serious if they were allowed to have them. The Postmaster General and everybody connected with the service have appealed for early consideration of this problem and for a final disposition of it at an early date in order that they may be able to meet the demands on the part of the South American Republics, who are anxious to deal with the United States rather than with any other country.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me say in reply, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I shall not press my objection, but I do reiterate that legislation of this kind and of this importance really ought not to be taken up on Consent Calendar day, but I am not going to press my objection. There seems to be a good reason why we should make an exception in this particular case.

Mr. MADDEN. That, I think, would be true under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw by objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when, in his judgment, the public interest will be promoted thereby, the Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of mails by air to foreign countries and insular possessions of the United States for periods of not more than 10 years, and to pay for such service from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails at fixed rates per pound or per mile; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to award such contracts to the bidders that he shall find to be the lowest responsible bidders that can satisfactorily perform the service required to the best advantage of the Government: Provided, That the rate to be paid for such service shall not in any case exceed $2 per mile: And provided further, That in the award, interpretation, and administration of the contracts herein authorized, the decision of the Postmaster General shall be final and not subject to review by any officer or tribunal of the United States, except by the President and the Federal courts.

SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall make and issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "service," strike out the following: "from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails," so that it shall read "pay for such service from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails at fixed rates per pound or per mile."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY: On page 2, line 1, after the word "service," strike out the words "from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment. In line 9, after the word "award," insert the word "and"; and after the word "interpretation" strike out the words "and administration."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY: Page 2, line 9, after the word "award," insert the word "and"; and after the word "interpretation" strike out the words "and administration," so that it will read: "And provided further, That in the award and interpretation of the contracts herein authorized."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PENSIONS FOR COMMISSIONED UNITED STATES DEPUTY MARSHALS FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 5709) may be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know its status after it remains on the calendar, there having been three objections. I shall not object, but I am wondering what would be the status of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. It will be in the same status it is now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the request is in order because the objections have stricken the bill from the calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am asking unanimous consent that it be passed over and that it remain on the calendar just as it is at present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the only way in which this could be done would be for the gentlemen who objected to temporarily withdraw their objections. It seems to me that this is the way to restore the bill to its former status on the calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will ask the gentleman if he did not state when he made the third objection, after the Speaker hesitated a long while to find out whether there were three objections, "for the time being, I object."

Mr. TILSON. Let me say to the gentleman, frankly, that I came into the Chamber just at the moment the bill was being reported by the Clerk and was not acquainted with its contents. Two gentlemen who have studied the bill objected to its consideration, and I thought that at least a third person ought to study the bill. For this reason I objected temporarily until I could study the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what I understood.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, no request has been made of me to withdraw my objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not get an opportunity to ask the gentleman, but I did ask the other two gentlemen who objected.

Mr. CRAMTON. The only question I have in mind is what would be the result if the gentleman from Oklahoma did keep the bill on the calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS. It would be on the calendar and would be subject to be stricken off upon three objections.

Mr. CRAMTON. As the Speaker has ruled, it would not be anything but an ornament to the calendar without a withdrawal of the objections, I am willing for the present to withdraw my objection if the other gentlemen do.

Mr. TILSON. With the understanding that it go over?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, certainly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill may be restored to the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 5709) may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes on the bill H. R. 6669.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC PRINTER

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of Members to the bill (H. R. 6669) objected to a few minutes ago. This is a bill from the Committee on Printing, and was also favorably reported to the House during the Sixty-ninth Congress. The committee is unanimous in its report and feels that this measure deserves favorable consideration. I realize that objection was made to its consideration to-day, but it will come up later for consideration. I merely want to call your attention to the bill, so that you can examine the report which the committee has made. For nearly 16 years I have served as a member of the Joint Committee on Printing. That is the longest service any Member of the House has had. I am, therefore, familiar with the excellent work that is being done by the Public Printer. The Government Printing Office employs over 4,000 men and women and transacts a business of $12,000,000 annually. The salary of the Public Printer is not commensurate with his responsibilities. A private establishment employing anything like that number of men and women and doing that amount of business would probably pay its manager $20,000 to $30,000 a year. During the last three or four years we have raised the pay of all the men and women in the Government Printing Office. Employees who were receiving 50 and 55 cents per hour when I came here are now paid $1, $1.10, and $1.15 per hour. The only officials whose salaries have not been raised are the Public Printer and the Deputy Public Printer. The Director of the Budget has twice recommended and approved an increase from $7,500 to $10,000. To-day the pay of the Librarian of Congress has been raised from $7,500 to $10,000, and the Public Printer is also deserving of a similar increase.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

SCOTT FIELD, ILL.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10146) to authorize appropriations for construction at Scott Field, Ill., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I have an amendment to that bill, and I assume the gentleman will not object to it. This is one of the bills coming from the Committee on Military Affairs which seems to me to be unnecessary legislation on a Consent Calendar. It authorizes an appropriation where there is already authority of law. But if the gentleman will strike out the words "as in the judgment of the Secretary of War it may be necessary," I will not object. I think something should be left to the Committee on Appropriations to pass on.

Mr. IRWIN. There was an appropriation of $100,000, but they say they can not put up a standard building with that amount of money.

Mr. CRAMTON. Was there a limit of cost, or was it simply an appropriation?

Mr. IRWIN. It was an authorization for $100,000, and it is under construction, but the War Department says it will take $30,000 more, and therefore they are not able to go on until they have this authorization.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will consent to strike out this blanket authority to the Secretary of War, I will be glad to consent.

Mr. IRWIN. I will agree to that.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $32,000, to be expended for the completion of barracks at Scott Field, Ill., including such utilities and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "such," and on page 1, line 6, after the word "thereto," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS AT DAYTON, OHIO

Mr. ROY FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we return to H. R. 132, authorizing the erection of a sanitary fireproof hospital at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Dayton, Ohio, which was passed over temporarily.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, this is a bill where the gentleman from Ohio has had considerable difficulty between the conflicting authority of committees. When it was up last time I urged that there should be a report from the Director of the Budget either one way or the other. It seems that although the gentleman has been diligent he has not been able to get such report, but has only been able to get a telephone statement of the attitude of the Budget.

By reason of the peculiar circumstances of this case, I shall not object to it to-day, but I say this: Members who are seeking large appropriations in the future ought not to expect to get them by unanimous consent, unless there is before the House a report from the Budget, either favorable or adverse, so that the House may know there has been a checking up upon the matter by the proper authorities. As I say, by reason of the peculiar circumstances of this matter, I shall not object to this particular bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if there is no report from the Director of the Budget I think we may as well have one. I think we ought to have one on a large bill of this kind. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected at the Central Branch of said home at Dayton, Ohio, on land now owned by the United States, a sanitary fireproof hospital of a capacity for 500 beds. Such hospital shall include all the necessary buildings with the appropriate mechanical equipment, including roads and trackage facilities leading thereto, for the accommodation of patients, and storage, laundry, and necessary furniture equipment, and accessories, as may be approved by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the persons now by law entitled to the privileges of treatment in this hospital when constructed there shall be admitted and treated honorably discharged nurses (female) who have served with the armed forces of the United States in any war and who are disabled by disease or wounds and by reason of such disability are either temporarily or permanently incapacitated from earning a living.

SEC. 3. That in carrying the foregoing authorization into effect the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the construction of the plant, or to purchase materials in the open market or otherwise, and to employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of the plant complete at a limit of cost not to exceed $1,500,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10487) to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 10487, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 302 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, are amended, to take effect as of December 31, 1927, to read as follows:

"(b) Such application shall be made and filed on or before January 2, 1930, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than the representative authorized by any such regulation, or not filed on or before January 2, 1930, shall be held void. If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person: Provided, however, That if the veteran died between May 19, 1924, and July 1, 1924, without making the application, leaving a widow surviving him, the application may be made by the widow and shall be valid with the same force and effect in every respect as if the application had been made by the veteran.

"(c) If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefits of this act on behalf of the veteran, and is filed on or before January 2, 1930, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the veteran dies and payments are made to his dependents under Title VI, and thereafter a valid application is filed under this section, then if the adjusted service credit of the veteran is more than $50, payment shall be made in accordance with Title V, less any amounts already paid under Title VI."

SEC. 2. Section 602 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended, to take effect as of December 31, 1927, to read as follows:

"SEC. 602. (a) No payment under section 601 shall be made to a widow if she has remarried before making application, or if at the time of the death of the veteran was living apart from him by reason of her own willful act; nor unless dependent at the time of the death of the veteran or at any time thereafter and before January 3, 1930. The widow shall be presumed to have been dependent at the time of the death of the veteran upon a showing of the marital cohabitation.

"(b) Payment under section 601 shall be made to a child if (1) under 18 years of age at the time of the death of the veteran, or (2) at any time thereafter and before January 3, 1930, incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect.

"(c) No payment under section 601 shall be made to a mother or father unless dependent at the time of the death of the veteran or at any time thereafter and before January 3, 1930. If at the time of the death of the veteran or at any time thereafter and before January 3, 1930, the mother is unmarried or over 60 years of age, or the father is over 60 years of age, such mother or father, respectively, shall be presumed to be dependent."

SEC. 3. Subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 604 of such act, as amended, are amended, to take effect as of December 31, 1927, to read as follows:

"(b) Applications for such benefits, whether vested or contingent, shall be made and filed by the dependents of the veteran on or before January 2, 1930; except that in the case of the death of the veteran during the six months immediately preceding such date the application shall be made and filed at any time within six months after the death of the veteran. Payments under this title shall be made only to dependents who have made and filed application in accordance with the provisions of this subdivision.

"(c) An application shall be made and filed (1) personally by the dependent if 16 years of age or over, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity or legal disability prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the dependent and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made or filed by a person other than the representative authorized by such regulation shall be held void."

SEC. 4. Title III of such act, as amended, is amended, to take effect as of May 19, 1924, by adding at the end thereof new sections to read as follows:

"SEC. 311. Where the records of the War Department or the Navy Department show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of any provision of this act, has been filed on or before January 2, 1930, and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed. In such case the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, shall not be required to transmit to the director the application (as provided in sections 303 and 605) unless a new application is filed, in which case the new application shall be considered to have been filed on the date of filing of the lost application.

"SEC. 312. (a) If satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued and unexplained absence of any individual from his home and family for a period of seven years, during which period no intelligence of his existence has been received, the death of such individual as of the date of the expiration of such period shall, for the purposes of this act, be considered as sufficiently proved.

"(b) If in the case of any such individual who is a veteran it appears that his application was not made and filed prior to the beginning of such seven-year period, or that although entitled to receive adjusted service pay he did not receive it prior to the beginning of such seven-year period, then his dependents who have made and filed application before the date of the expiration of such seven-year period (if such period began before January 3, 1930) shall be entitled to receive the amount of his adjusted service credit in accordance with the provisions of Title VI.

"(c) For the purposes of subdivision (b) of this section—

"(1) The widow shall be considered to be dependent, within the meaning of section 602, if she was dependent at the beginning of such seven-year period or at any time thereafter and before the expiration of such period. The widow shall be presumed to have been dependent at the beginning of such seven-year period upon a showing of the marital cohabitation.

"(2) A child shall be considered incapable of self-support, within the meaning of section 602, if incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect at the beginning of such seven-year period or at any time thereafter and before the expiration of such period.

"(3) The mother or father shall be considered to be dependent, within the meaning of section 602, if dependent at the beginning of such seven-year period or at any time thereafter and before the expiration of such period. If at the expiration of such seven-year period the mother is unmarried or over 60 years of age, or the father is over 60 years of age, such mother or father, respectively, shall be presumed to be dependent.

"(d) In the case of a veteran, if it appears that he is still living, payments to dependents in respect of his death shall cease, and, if he has filed a valid application under the provisions of section 302, any payments already made shall be deducted from the face value of his adjusted service certificate, or from the amount of his adjusted service credit if such credit is not more than $50. In the case of a dependent, if it appears that such dependent is still living, payments to dependents later in preference under this act shall cease, and, if such dependent has filed a valid application under the provisions of section 604, the remainder of the payments shall be made in accordance with the provisions of Title VI.

"SEC. 313. That where any payment under this act is to be made to a minor, other than a person in the military or naval forces of the United States, or to a person mentally incompetent, or under other legal disability adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, such payment may be made to the legally constituted guardian, curator, or conservator of the person entitled to payment, or to the person found by the director to be otherwise legally vested with the care of the person entitled to payment or of his estate. Prior to the receipt of notice by the bureau that any such person entitled to payment is under such legal disability, payment may be made to such person direct."

SEC. 5. Title V of such act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 508. Notwithstanding any other provision of this act a veteran may, under regulations prescribed by the director, name more than one beneficiary, and may from time to time, with the approval of the director, change such beneficiaries. If the director is unable to ascertain the beneficiary named by the veteran, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran."

SEC. 6. Section 702 of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 702. Whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of Title III, IV, V, VI, or VII, or of any regulation made under any such title, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

SEC. 7. This act shall not invalidate any payments made or applications received, before the enactment of this act, under the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended. Payments under awards heretofore or hereafter made shall be made to the dependent entitled thereto regardless of change in status, unless another dependent establishes to the satisfaction of the director a priority of preference under such act, as amended. Upon the establishment of such preference the remaining installments shall be paid to such dependent, but in no case shall the total payments under Title VI of such act, as amended (except section 608), exceed the adjusted service credit of the veteran.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy Members; not a quorum.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-three Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi to 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GREEN. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the House for the very complimentary reception just given me, which I suppose is in view of an anticipated event which in many ways is much to my regret. Yet, of course, the House understands that the present situation would not have developed had I not consented to it. At the proper time I hope to make further acknowledgment of the many kindnesses which I have received from the Members of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House amending the adjusted compensation act has three distinct features. First, and probably the most important feature in the bill is that it extends for two years the time for filing applications for adjusted compensation. There are now in the office of the Veterans' Bureau some 30,000 applications on file which can not be granted under the present situation of the law, having been filed too late. My understanding is that about 27,000 defective applications were actually filed before the expiration of the time limit under the present law—that is, before January 1 last. The Secretary of War was trying to hold, and I think did hold, that these applications might be correct when they were not in proper form by a subsequent amendment thereto. The Comptroller General, however, seemed to think that he had jurisdiction over the matter, and held that unless there was a proper application before the Secretary at the time, while the act was in force, the application could not be granted. And in that, as I understand, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau concurred. As a result none of these applications were granted, although a large number had endeavored to obtain the benefits of the law within the time prescribed by it.

Now, there is no good reason why all of these parties should not have their applications reinstated or why they should not be permitted to file. In fact, the testimony before the committee showed that a number of applicants for many reasons had not understood the rights they had under the law, or the benefits of it, and some did not understand that they had any privileges whatever granted to them. So far as increased appropriations are concerned, it will make no difference, because the sinking fund created by the original law will be ample to take care of the applications that can be filed. About 4,350,000 veterans are eligible to receive awards under the adjusted compensation, and approximately 3,500,000 applications have been filed. We should give the remainder another opportunity to file.

Another important matter related to lost applications, where applications had been received and returned for some reason, but the veterans contend that they never got their applications back, and as a consequence never succeeded in getting their applications allowed. Provision is made in the bill with reference to lost applications.

Then there is another matter that seems to the committee necessary in order to carry out the purposes of the bill, and that relates to cases where the veteran has been absent from his home for seven years. These cases should be treated as under the laws generally; that is, as if they were deceased, and their beneficiaries should be permitted to apply for the benefits of the adjusted compensation. This is provided for in the bill.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Is there any provision of law for the certification of loss of certificates of discharge? That is, if a certificate is lost, is there any provision for securing a certified copy?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that is in the original law. It is not provided for by this amendment made by the bill.

The other changes made by the bill may not seem of very great importance in some ways, but they were made for the purpose of making it easier and simpler for applications to be filed and granted. They are largely clerical, and unless some one has further questions to ask I shall not proceed any further at this time.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I would like to say to the gentleman that the provision as reported by him is very reasonable. Today I had an application from a veteran who never qualified for adjusted compensation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are still many who have not applied. The committee thought they should be entitled to the benefits of the act. We finally concluded to extend the period for two years. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I simply want to say, without taking up much of the time of the House, that this is a unanimous report. The committee went into it very carefully. The purposes have been fully explained by the chairman. We have extended the time for filing claims for adjusted compensation, and in three or four instances we have made amendments and perfected the law, which should have been done at the time the law was passed. But experience showed the defects, and they have been smoothed out.

But before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, I want personally to express my regret at severing relations on the committee with the chairman, who has been my friend. It was a pleasure to serve with him. He was courteous in every way, and while the Court of Claims has gained, yet I want to say that this House has suffered a loss. I wish for our chairman all the good things of life, and I want to say to the Members of the House that from my association with him, knowing his fairness and honesty and devotion to duty, I am convinced that the Court of Claims is going to be very fortunate to have a man like Mr. GREEN of Iowa as one of its members. [Applause.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, not having served on the committee with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], but having had several interesting, good-natured battles on the floor with him during my membership in this House, I want to take this occasion before I speak on the bill to congratulate the gentleman from Iowa and to say that I have the highest respect and esteem for him, have always appreciated his fine character, and wish him every success and all the good luck in the world when he leaves this House. [Applause.]

I am glad to see the Committee on Ways and Means come in with a unanimous report on this bill. There are 500,000 men who are going to benefit by this bill being passed to-day, and I hope it will be passed unanimously.

I do not wish to take up much time, but I would like to make a suggestion to all my colleagues, and that is that they get in touch with the service organizations in their districts and let these organizations know what the House of Representatives has done in this bill to-day and ask them to notify the service men in every congressional district of the United States that there is such a thing as a soldier's bonus. I say this very seriously because many of the service men have been so busy trying to scrape a living for themselves and their little families since the war that they have had small opportunity to keep in touch with the doings of Congress.

There are 500,000 men who evidently have not known that Congress passed a soldiers' bonus and have not applied for it. I know that in my own district I have sent out thousands of letters to the boys asking them and begging them to apply for their bonus, and some of them have come in since the time for filing elapsed on January 1 last. I merely wish to make that suggestion to my colleagues in the House so that these men may know they are eligible for the benefits of the adjusted compensation act.

In conclusion all I can say is that I congratulate the committee on their unanimous report and I hope this bill will pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I desire to speak briefly on the pending measure by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to amend the adjusted compensation act. I was pleased with the enthusiasm Members of this body gave our distinguished colleague, author of the pending measure, when the announcement was made a few moments ago that he had been appointed to the Court of Claims. I know I voice the sentiment of each Member of this House, regardless of politics, when I say that we all regret to see him leave us, but rejoice in the fact that he has been so signally honored. May I say that during all of his public career he has never presented a more just measure than the one we now have before us.

Mr. Speaker, the measure now under consideration is of vital importance to more than 500,000 former service men, their wives, children, and dependents. The pending measure is of unusual interest to me for the reason that I have introduced a similar bill. In fact, I find that the committee has incorporated a part of my bill into this one, which proposes to extend for two years the time in which to file applications for adjusted compensation.

Permit me to say just here, Mr. Speaker, that I can not quite agree with the gentleman who preceded me in referring to this bill as a bonus. Oh, we have heard considerable talk concerning the so-called bonus for World War veterans, but I insist this is a misnomer. It is not a bonus. I submit that a bonus implies a gift.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I merely wish to say to the gentleman that the reason I used the word "bonus" is that I have found that ex-service men do not differentiate between adjusted compensation and the disabled compensation which they get from the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; I understand that to be true, but nevertheless, this measure is not a bonus nor a gift, and it is a gross injustice to our boys to refer to this as a bonus. The so-called bonus bill merely attempts to adjust partially the compensation of those soldiers who left home and loved ones and faced German machine guns at $1 a day, suffering untold agonies during those terrible days of the war, while those who were employed at home drew their ten, fifteen, or twenty dollars per day.

It occurs to me that it is wrong to speak of this mere pittance as a bonus. They answered the call of our Government when we needed men as we have never needed them before and I hope and pray will never need them in the future. But now, Mr. Speaker, we find that even this bagatelle granted to our soldiers by Congress in the place of the measure they asked for can not be collected by over a half million ex-soldiers for the reason that the date of filing for same has expired.

In the sixth Oklahoma district, the one I have the honor to represent in Congress, I learned that dependents of more than 100 World War veterans had not applied for adjusted compensation a few days prior to January 1, 1928. I sent telegrams to the newspapers in my district urging that they advise the public of the date of the expiration of the time for filing for adjusted compensation. I also wired the commanders of every American Legion post in my district, as well as others interested, and due to the splendid cooperation of my people, the best people on earth, we were able to get about 50 dependents of deceased veterans, many of whom were in great need, to apply for this compensation. But as to those others whom we failed to get in touch with, the door is forever closed unless Congress extends the time for those boys and their dependents to apply.

So I would say to the Members of the House that to my mind the most important feature of this bill is the provision extending the time for two additional years for applying for the adjusted compensation by former World War soldiers or their dependents. This bill extends the date from January 1, 1928, to January 1, 1930.

Then, there are other important provisions in this bill. This measure, if passed, will forever settle the time in which a person may be said to be legally dead. Under the existing law this matter is not clear. Unfortunately, all of our States do not have uniform laws. In some States it takes seven years for a person to be legally dead, while in others it takes four or more. But this measure forever settles the question of when a person is legally dead, and will aid many deserving dependents to collect what is rightfully theirs.

It might be of interest to you gentlemen to say that the American Legion and other veterans' organizations are backing this measure as well as others to amend the veterans' adjusted compensation act. I had the honor and pleasure to be a member of the resolutions committee of the last annual American Legion Convention, which met in Paris, France, last year. If I remember correctly, the relief sought by this measure was presented by our committee to the convention in the resolutions adopted at the Paris convention. Then, too, our legionnaires of Oklahoma, at their last convention, demanded that the adjusted compensation law be extended and clarified, and the time extended as this measure proposes to do. No doubt other States did likewise.

Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly frank, this bill does not offer as much relief as I had hoped would come from our committee. There are many other defects in the present law that to my mind ought to be corrected. I sincerely hope many corrections will be made before the Seventieth Congress adjourns. I have introduced some bills to do that and many other gentlemen have also offered some splendid measures that I hope we will get a chance to vote on. But merely because this measure does not correct all the evils of the present law I certainly would not raise my voice against the passage of this bill, and I sincerely trust that none of you will do so.

Let the news go forth that this Congress has done its duty in the passage of the pending measure and a cry of joy will go up in every nook and corner of America. Not only will the 500,000 or 600,000 of those directly affected by the passage of this measure be pleased to know we have done the square thing by our boys but all good patriotic citizens will rejoice to know Members of Congress have not forgotten the men who unflinchingly did their duty during those awful, never-to-be-forgotten days of the most terrible war the world has ever known.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on this particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their own remarks on this bill for five legislative days. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I asked for this time merely to bring to the attention of the House one thing which I feel very deeply should have been done in connection with this measure. None of us objects to the provisions of the bill, but the persistent policy of bringing in every veterans' bill under suspension of the rules calls for repeated consideration of worthy provisions which should have been included before.

I will mention one thing, and I venture the assertion that there are not a dozen men in the House who would not concede its justness and its advisability as a provision of law. If a man got killed on the 11th of November, 1918, who had served the maximum amount of time, his family gets only the basic pay of $625, whereas if a man served throughout the war without being killed and made his application and died the day after making his said application, his family gets the full amount of the adjusted service certificate, which is about three times as much as the other family received.

Now, this is unfair. If a man died the day before he could have made his application under the law, his family gets simply basic pay; whereas if a man died the day after making his application under the law, his family gets the full amount of the adjusted service certificate. This is a glaring discrimination and puts a penalty on a man because he either got killed in service or died before he had an opportunity under the law to make his application.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. I quite agree with the gentleman as to the sentiment of the House, but was this matter presented to the commitee?

Mr. BROWNING. I will assure the gentleman the matter has been presented repeatedly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I wish to remind the gentleman that when this adjusted compensation bill was first passed we on this side of the House who are ex-service men took the position that there was only one thing to do, and that was to pay the same amount of cash to all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman does not state the matter so the House will understand it. I know the gentleman wants to state it fairly.

Mr. BROWNING. I will be glad for the gentleman to correct any misstatement I have made.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In one case they get the cash in a lump sum and in the other case they get it in 20 years.

Mr. BROWNING. Oh, no. The bureau can pay it all in cash if they want to. When the man dies his certificate has matured.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; but he is not in the same position as the other man.

Mr. BROWNING. They usually pay it in 10 quarterly payments and settle it all in two and one-half years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman would consider a beneficiary who gets the cash at once in the same position as one who may have to wait 20 years. Life insurance companies do not treat the matter in that way. If this is insurance, it should be treated as such.

Mr. BROWNING. Of course, if the gentleman wants to say that the Government can quibble over technicalities, that is all right. I admit these boys can not sue the Government and make them pay it, but I say that this House, in order to do justice, should have put a provision of that kind in this bill, and I venture the assertion further that had this bill come in with privilege of offering this one amendment there would not have been a dozen votes against it. This is one of the most glaring discriminations that are constantly being made with veterans' measures, and surely the gentleman who is the chairman of this committee, and whom we all love, is not afraid to defend his bill on the floor. Surely the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation would not be afraid to defend its bill on the floor, and surely the House is not going to do something that is crazy.

If they would just give us the privilege of considering one adjusted compensation measure and one veterans' measure with open discussion on the floor, with privilege of amendment, where we could arrive at the accumulated wisdom of the Members of this House, then we would all be satisfied and we would not have to do it over every year. [Applause.]

I simply wanted to register my protest against this kind of procedure, wherein we are forever denied the privilege of amendment and discussion of any kind of veterans' legislation on this floor.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. May I ask this question for the sake of bringing before the membership of the House an interesting bit of information? When the President vetoed the bonus bill he said: "The veterans as a whole do not want it"; but, according to the figures brought in to-day by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, it appears that 87 per cent have already wanted it.

Mr. BROWNING. Yes; I think the President was mistaken.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not take this time to throw bouquets at the Ways and Means Committee but to offer this criticism. This is not a bonus. This is adjusted compensation. It belongs to these men, and it seems to me that it is unnecessary to be passing these measures every two years and hedging them about with these limitations. Besides, there is a flagrant discrimination in this law which I have been trying to get corrected.

I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] that we ought to have been permitted to amend this bill on the floor. If a veteran—listen to this—if a veteran dies and leaves a dependent brother or sister, I do not care if he is only 5 or 10 years old, under this bill he can not get his adjusted compensation.

This is property. It is a part of his wages as a soldier in the Army and it ought to go to his dependents or to his estate when he dies if he has not lived to make the application himself; and I should like to see the Ways and Means Committee bring in one of these bills, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] has said, and let us amend it to take care of all these men. You are going to have to do it. You are not saving anything by this piecemeal legislation every two years. We are going to continue this drive until all these boys or their families or their estates have had an opportunity to secure the benefits coming to them under the adjusted compensation act. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the vote is unanimous.

So the bill was passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—ADJUSTED COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave granted to extend remarks on H. R. 10487, "An act to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended," I take this opportunity to make some observations on this proposed legislation. It is unfortunate that bills of this kind are brought up for consideration on the floor of the House under suspension of the rules. This precludes amendments and limits debate to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to those who favor the proposed legislation and 20 minutes to those opposed. Members are thus precluded from discussing the merits of the bill on the floor as the limit of time will not permit, and amendments, however meritorious, can not be proposed or considered by the House membership.

The privilege of extending remarks in the RECORD is the only method by which a Member can voice his sentiments either for or against legislation when considered by the House under suspension of the rules as this bill is considered.

I am heartily in favor of the bill. It is a piece of meritorious legislation. There is an inequality in the law as it exists, however, that is not cured by this bill. If a soldier was killed prior to the signing of the armistice in November, 1918, his dependents get the basic pay only, whereas the dependents of a soldier surviving that date, where application has been made, get the full benefit of the adjusted service certificate in the event of the death of the soldier later. This is an inequality that should be remedied and I am confident would have been remedied by the House if an opportunity had been given to consider amendments.

Under existing law the time within which application might be made for adjusted compensation expired January 1, 1928. Some 500,000 veterans and dependents to whom compensation was available failed through neglect or ignorance of statutory limitation to make claim. Perhaps some of these do not care to claim the benefits of the act, but those who do desire to make claim and failed to do so through neglect or otherwise should not be denied that right. Under the proposed bill such applications may be filed on or before January 2, 1930. I am glad to see the time extended to January 2, 1930.

I understand some 30,000 applications have already been received by the War and Navy Departments since the time under existing law for filing expired.

Many thousand more will doubtless be filed when the veterans are advised of their rights. Some from my own district have written me that they failed to claim adjusted compensation before the time limit. This amendment will restore their right to claim their adjusted compensation.

Dependents likewise have the right to file within the time allowed veterans, and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, under regulations to be prescribed by them, may designate some one to make the application without the necessity of a legal guardian being appointed by the courts. Provision is likewise made in the case of lost applications. In such case the application shall be considered as valid when originally filed.

Another wise provision of the bill is the provision in the case of veterans who have been missing for a period of seven years or more. In such cases there is a presumption of death and applications by dependents of such veterans after such time are authorized.

The bill will afford relief to many deserving veterans and their dependents, and I hope it will meet with favor in the body at the other end of the Capitol and receive Executive approval.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is to amend the World War adjusted compensation act and has for its three main purposes, first, the extension for a period of two years the time within which application may be filed for the adjusted compensation. This time expired on January 1, 1928; and if this bill finally passes the Senate and is approved by the President it will extend the time to January 1, 1930.

It is estimated there were some 4,350,000 soldiers eligible to receive the benefits of the adjusted compensation act. The statement has been made during the discussion of this bill that 3,795,000 ex-service men have made application up to the present time, and that of the applications made 3,498,000 have been allowed. This leaves approximately 500,000 ex-service men who have not yet applied for this adjusted compensation.

The second important matter in the bill is an administrative one making the determination of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy concerning the validity of a lost application final.

The third purpose of the bill is to extend the benefits of the act to dependents of veterans who have been absent from home continuously and without explanation for a period of seven years. In other words, the act extends the presumption of death of ex-service men who have been absent and not heard from for more than seven years.

This bill should and will pass the House unanimously. I am glad to support it as I have supported all other legislation recommended for the ex-service men.

I was a Member of the House in 1917 during the World War, and the responsibility was in part mine to assist in the enactment of legislation to help win the war. We passed then all of the needed legislation not only to raise an Army and to strengthen the Navy but to clothe and equip them. We voted large sums of money and massed all of our resources in order that the war might be speedily terminated.

In the short period from April, 1917, to the date of the armistice, November 11, 1918, approximately 4,350,000 of the flower of our youth joined the Army. About half of them were thrown across the sea. They were given but little training, but they gave a splendid account of themselves. The fact that legislation was enacted to mass our men and resources enabled us to speedily terminate the war. Our allies had not won an important engagement before our soldiers reached France. They were dispirited and discouraged. In the preliminary or rather minor parts our soldiers took in the engagements after reaching France they gave a good account of themselves. They heartened the Allies and discouraged the enemy troops.

In the middle of July, 1918, we joined in the Battle of Chateau Thierry and relieved Paris and turned the tide of battle. In September we took the offensive in the St. Mihiel drive and won a glorious and sweeping victory. Immediately following we took an important part in the Argonne offensive, and our soldiers made it possible for us to win that victory and to bring to a close the bloodiest war in all history on November 11, 1918.

During the war I earnestly supported all measures for its prosecution. Since its conclusion I have voted for every generous consideration to be given to the ex-service men who enrolled under our colors and made it possible to carry our flag to a triumphant victory. During the war we appropriated money to make it possible to assist in caring for the dependents at home while our soldiers were away fighting for their country. Upon the termination of the war we voted for vocational education to rehabilitate the disabled. We built hospitals and we made provision for alleviating the pain and suffering and caring for the wounded. We voted for the adjusted compensation act and all amendments thereto. During the war we voted for the provision authorizing the men in arms to be insured at a reasonable rate. We have voted to continue the time within which application may be made for the adjusted compensation. We believe that this Government should be generous with those who enrolled under our colors and made it possible, in an incredibly short time, to bring to a successful close this great war. Our responsibility does not end here. We should continue to take care of the dependents of those who gave their lives for their country. We should hospitalize and care for those who are wounded and afflicted. We should be generous in the administration of our laws in passing upon claims for compensation.

Many of our soldiers were anxious to return home upon discharge, and did not know that the strain and hardship they had undergone would so soon wreck their health and disable them to an extent that they would not be able to support themselves. Many of them are called upon for proof they are unable to supply, as in many cases the best individual records were not kept. They know they entered the Government service strong and healthy and able to do an unlimited amount of work and to support themselves and those dependent upon them. Within a short time after their discharge their strength failed and they found themselves afflicted with disease and yet many of them do not have the connecting link of testimony which is sufficiently strong and convincing to prove that their disabilities were of service origin. My criticism is that this testimony should be more generously construed and I think all of the presumption should be indulged in favor of the ex-service men. Congress has enacted much favorable legislation and it should not be neutralized and made of no benefit because it is not sympathetically administered. We will continue to support hospitals with generous appropriations and, as I stated a moment ago, we will continue to take care of the disabled and their dependents who lost life and health in the service of their country.

Just one word more. I want to invite attention to the fact that this bill is brought up under suspension of the rules of the House. Now, the public does not understand what this means. It means this: That the leaders of the House are not, and have never been, willing to permit Congress to consider legislation for the benefit of the ex-service men at a time and in such a way that amendments may be offered and the whole subject opened up for consideration, discussion, and amendment. During the past five years we have not had an opportunity in the House to consider soldier legislation upon its merits with an opportunity for amendment. Under the rules under which this bill is being considered no amendment can be offered, and Members of the House must vote either for or against a motion to suspend the rules of the House and pass the bill. This requires a two-thirds vote. Of course, no Member of the House will vote against any bill for the relief of the ex-service men, however small. Many of us, however, would like an opportunity to have a bill brought before the House when the whole subject may be considered at length and when amendments expressive of the will of the House may be offered and considered and voted upon. I do not recall, during the past six years, any bill affecting soldiers that has been permitted to be brought before the House for a full consideration with an opportunity for amendment, and no bill of any consequence, as I now recall, since the final termination of the war.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to submit the following:

As is quite often the case when a law is enacted, after it has been in force for a while it is found that changes are necessary in order to cover the full intent of the law. I feel sure this was the case in the adjusted compensation law, and I am heartily in favor of the changes which have been made by the amendments to that act.

In my district in New York a great many of the veterans who are eligible to receive the benefits of this act have not taken advantage of it. In many instances it was through ignorance of the law, and when they did learn of it it was too late to file their applications. I am informed many thousands of applications were received by the Navy and War Departments which were of no value to the applicants until some new legislation was enacted. Now, upon the extension of the time they can receive the benefits to which they are so justly entitled. There is no question of asking for additional appropriations to carry out the law with the added amendments, as I am advised the sinking fund created by the original law will take care of any additional applications which will be made.

Then, too, the question of the dependents is a very vital one. I know in a great many cases the veterans did not return to their homes. In some instances they have been located and restored to their families, but in most cases this is not the rule and it is nothing but fair the dependents of those veterans should receive the benefits of the act, even if they are not able to produce evidence of the death of the veteran.

I think this measure as it now stands is thoroughly satisfying to the American Legion and other veterans' organizations and I feel the Ways and Means Committee were very just in their report on the bill and am most happy to know the law is so amended as to cover many needed points.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 10487 has for its purpose the extending of the period of time two years longer in order that the ex-service men who are entitled to the same may file for their adjusted service compensation. It is stated that some 850,000 veterans or their dependents failed to apply for the adjusted service compensation; that there are pending now before the United States Veterans' Bureau some 57,000 applications which were either filed too late or are defective.

This legislation, then, gives further time in which to file applications and gives opportunity for the correction of defective applications. A further feature is that lost applications can be properly accounted for and validated and permits the filing of new applications as of the date of the original filing.

If a veteran has continued an unexplained absence from his home and family for a period of seven years, and that fact is shown by evidence, by the enactment of this legislation the Veterans' Bureau is authorized to consider the death of the veteran to exist.

This will permit the disposition of what the ex-service man would be legally entitled to from the Government to go to his legal dependents.

Many other features of this amendment tend to more clearly solve some of the complications that have arisen before the bureau of the Government having in charge the interpretation of legislation for veterans of the World War.

The present amendments are intended directly to assist those who have neglected, or through lack of proper knowledge have failed, to avail themselves of the benefits conferred by legislation for their services to our country; and in case of the death of the veteran so that his dependents may receive the benefits to which the soldier is justly entitled.

The entire bonus insurance plan will cost the Government something like $2,000,000.

The World War cost the Nation the sum of $423,405,993 for the first three months of the war (April 6 to June 30, 1917); war expenditures for the fiscal year 1917–18 were $8,242,039,268; and those for the fiscal year 1918–19 are placed at $14,312,821,707. (Page 87, "War Costs and Their Financing" by E. L. Bogart, professor of economics, University of Illinois and sometimes assistant foreign trade adviser in the United States Department of State.)

That all men who served in that war should share in the bonus insurance was the purpose of the legislation first enacted by Congress. The purpose of this amended legislation is that in due time all of the ex-service men, or in case of their death then their legal dependents, will receive that which the original law intended.

The soldiers of the World War should be so treated by this Government that should there still remain nations who believe that the power of might should be the dominant spirit in affairs of government, a true patriotism may exist among those who served this country in its hour of need; that our now soldier citizen may keep alive in the people a spirit of love of country and patriotic duty for the protection of the principles of government.

It is to this end that a national defense day has been established and designated by the President each year. Not that a spirit of war may be created, but rather that a true spirit of patriotism and national pride may be fostered in the Nation.

Our four million and more World War veterans should be treated by a fair national policy to feel that our Government is a just Government. The Government has legislated in many ways since the close of the World War for the veterans; it has expended in care, hospitalization, etc., an enormous sum of money.

For the information of our citizens I desire to insert here the casualties of the various wars our Nation has figured in. Then let us carefully contemplate the grief and sorrow which have been caused in our own country and similarly in all the world.

CASUALTIES

(Information digested from sources cited)

REVOLUTIONARY WAR

From the Battle of Lexington to the surrender of Yorktown, in 24 engagements, the American losses in the field were about 8,000. (Collier's New Encyclopedia, v. 15, p. 6686.)

WAR OF 1812

The number killed in battle was about 1,500; the total killed and wounded in land battles not far from 5,000; and the grand total of losses, including prisoners, 9,700. (Kendric C. Babcock. The Rise of American Nationality, v. 13 of the American Nation, edited by A. B. Hart. Harper & Bros., 1906, p. 188.)

MEXICAN WAR

Total losses were 1,549 killed or died of wounds; 10,986 died of disease. The mortality from disease was 110 per 1,000 per annum; the battle losses, 15. (Capt. Louis C. Duncan, Medical Department of the United States Army in the Civil War. Informally issued by Surgeon General's Office. Seaman prize essay appended, pp. 24, 25.)

CIVIL WAR

For the Union armies the total number of deaths was 359,528. Of these, 67,058 were killed in battle and 43,012 died of wounds, giving a total of 110,070 deaths from battle casualties, equivalent to a rate of 33 per 100 per annum. For Confederate armies it is estimated that the battle losses were 94,000 and that twice as many died of disease. (Capt. Louis C. Duncan, Medical Department, etc., p. 28.)

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

Total deaths from all causes in the Army were 2,910, including 280 killed. The wounded numbered 1,577, of whom 65 died. Died of disease, 2,565. (U. S. War Dept. annual reports, 1898; v. 1, pt. 1, p. 272.)

PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION

Following were the losses sustained by United States troops: Killed, 777; died of wounds, 227; died of disease, 2,572; died of miscellaneous causes, 588; total deaths, 4,165; wounded, 2,911. (U. S. Dept. of War annual reports, 1902, v. 1, p. 291.)

WORLD WAR

United States:
Mobilized	4,272,521
Dead	67,813
Wounded	192,483
Prisoners or missing	14,363
Total	274,659

(The new International Yearbook, 1918, p. 761.)

We note the above figures and are struck with awe at the horrors of war. Yet with all of this, the obligation is imposed upon each child born to the Nation, when that child reaches the age of accountability, to realize its duty of defending the honor, integrity, and stability of the country.

I believe nations can avoid war. The real principle in government is justice, and it should be the highest function of government to give the nation peace.

The words of the Father of His Country, George Washington, in his Farewell Address are brought to mind—

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it.

The words of the great statesman should make us realize that the achievements of our powerful Nation in the World War must never be used in a selfish way to overawe other or weaker nations by subjecting them to anything in government intercourse which may be construed as an attempt by us as a Nation to overlord or dictate to them.

The principles of our Government should never be used to the extent of permitting or protecting unsound or selfish business interests of our citizens in foreign countries; a policy to which our country is consciously or unconsciously drifting. It behooves our Government as a Nation not to take offense at every whim of some of the minor republics. I feel the truth of the words of a prominent statesman when he recently referred to our attitude toward our sister Republic below the Rio Grande: "God made them our neighbor; let us pray that justice will make them our friend."

The thought I am presenting in these remarks is that we should instill in our youth that the horrors of war, destruction, and wanton waster of human life, together with the destruction of national property, ought to be by some intelligent method prevented in the future.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SEVILLE, SPAIN

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the accompanying recommendation of the Secretary of State, I request of the Congress legislation that will authorize the appropriations heretofore made or hereafter to be made under the authority of Public Resolution No. 65, approved March 3, 1925, providing for the participation of the United States in an international exposition to be held in Seville, Spain, to be expended, for the purposes enumerated in the resolution, without regard to the provisions of any other act relating to the expenditure of public moneys, on the certificate of the Secretary of State that the materials or services were necessary to enable the Government of the United States to participate in the exposition.

The attention of Congress is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State and the memorandum of the Commission of the United States to the International Exposition at Seville, in which the details with regard to the necessity of the proposed amendment are set forth.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington.

INCREASE OF CIVIL WAR WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 10159) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War with an amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the widow or former widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and was honorably discharged from all contracts of service, or regardless of the length of service was discharged for disability incurred in service and in the line of duty, such widow or former widow having been married to the soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, 1905, and who is now or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years and is pensioned as such widow or former widow under the general pension law, or whose name may hereafter be placed on the pension roll under existing laws, shall be paid a pension at the rate of $40 a month, but nothing in this act shall be construed as decreasing the rate of pension granted by any other act.

SEC. 2. That the pension or increase of the rate of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rate herein provided, on the fourth day of the next month after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law but who may be entitled to a pension under the general pension laws, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions after the approval of this act in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the issue of a check in payment of a pension for which the execution and submission of a voucher was not required shall constitute payment in the event of the death of the pensioner on or after the last day of the period covered by such check, and it shall not be canceled, but shall become an asset of the estate of the deceased pensioner.

SEC. 3. That no claim agent, attorney, or other person shall demand, receive, or accept fees or compensation for the presentation or preparation of any such claim for increase in pension under this act, or be recognized as agent or attorney in the prosecution or adjudication of a claim for increase under this act, and any such person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or wrongfully withholds from a pensioner the whole or any part of the pension allowed or due a pensioner under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not to exceed $500 or imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with or inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby modified and amended only so far and to the extent herein specifically provided and stated.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think all the Members of the House are familiar with this bill. It is in the same form that it was when the bill passed the former House increasing the pension from $30 to $40. When the widow reaches the age of 75 it automatically advances the pension.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This bill relates to widows of the Civil War?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Yes; and former widows.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not there a mistake in the spelling on page 2, line 18? The word "commerce" should be "commence."

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. I think that is true.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the spelling on line 18, page 2, be corrected; that the spelling of the word "commence" be corrected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I demanded a second for the reason that I thought that there should be some discussion of the bill under consideration. This bill, as stated, was reported as a substitute by our committee for the many general pension bills which have been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The bill provides in part for pensions and increase of pensions to the amount of $40 per month for those widows and former widows who married subsequent to the discharge of their husbands from the Civil War, and prior to June 27, 1905, provided that they are now or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years. I believe the bill should have been amended to provide a monthly pension allowance of $50 for all widows of Civil War veterans who are now entitled to pensions under our general pension laws.

At a joint meeting of the Senate Committee on Pensions and the House Committee on Invalid Pensions held on January 18, 1928, hearings were had on the question of pension legislation. Representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic and allied organizations who appeared at this hearing unanimously stated that the present allowance to widows is grossly insufficient to decently support them; that most of the widows on the pension rolls are between 80 and 90 years of age, feeble, infirm, and unable to work or earn a livelihood, and many of them in destitute circumstances. The Grand Army of the Republic, Women's Relief Corps, Daughters of Union Veterans, Sons of Veterans, and Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, through their representatives, urgently supported and indorsed the proposition that a uniform allowance of $50 per month should be granted to widows of Civil War veterans who now have a pensionable status under the general pension laws. The evidence before the committee also disclosed that the widows are dying at about the rate of 11,000 annually. The names of 1,569 widows were dropped from the rolls during the month of December, 1927. The bill which has been reported and will pass this House does extend some relief, but not to the extent warranted by the emergency. The arbitrary age provision incorporated in this bill providing for an increase only to those who are now or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years is discriminatory for the reason that it leaves out in the cold thousands of deserving widows who have spent the best part of their lives in administering to the wants and needs of our veterans in their declining years.

In view of the high cost of living, it will not be seriously argued that the proposition of the majority of the committee to increase the present allowance $10 per month is adequate, just, or fairly meets the situation. The present bill is a makeshift and a refusal to squarely face the issue and grant a sufficient and reasonable allowance to these widows for their decent and necessary support in the few remaining years of their lives.

The Senate has already favorably reported at this session a bill carrying an allowance of $50 per month to widows of Civil War veterans who are now entitled to a pension under the general law. Why should the House hesitate to go along with the Senate? In the past our committee has reported favorably to the House a bill increasing the rate to $50 per month. On April 9, 1926, our committee favorably reported by unanimous vote the Elliott bill, which recommended an increase to $50 per month in pensions payable to those widows who were married prior to the 27th day of June, 1915. According to the report submitted in behalf of the bill to which I refer, H. R. 4023, I believe it was stated that such increase was not in conflict with the President's financial program. I refer the Members of the House to pages 1 and 2 of report No. 818, to accompany H. R. 4023. That report further stated—and the provisions therein were applicable to the widows as well as the veterans—that "the committee considered the bill as an emergency measure," further stating "that whatever more is to be done for these old soldiers and widows must be done soon. They are fast passing to their reward, where a grateful Nation can do no more to pay the debt it owes to them. To-day the average age of the widows is nearly 75 years." I call attention to the last paragraph of that report, which reads:

If this bill becomes a law, it will probably be the last expression of Congress in trying to discharge the debt of gratitude which the Nation owes to its saviors in its hour of darkest peril and to their dependents. In view of the rapid decrease in the number of these old veterans and widows, the increase granted by this bill will not be a burden on the Treasury for long, and your committee earnestly recommends the passage of H. R. 4023 at an early date.

In view of the attitude of the Committee on Invalid Pensions two years ago and that assumed by the Members of this Congress who have frequently and repeatedly expressed their views to the effect that they favored an adequate and substantial increase in pensions for these aged women, are we able to reconcile our views with the provisions of the bill under consideration? It was stated then that immediate action was needed; that they are rapidly passing to their final reward; that they originally received but meager pensions.

Does not a greater emergency exist to-day than existed some two years ago? We are advised that these widows are dying at the rate of about 11,000 annually. In a few years all will have passed into the silent land. Our Government is definitely committed to the policy of providing for their comfortable support and maintenance.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. Can the gentleman tell the House offhand how much increased burden this will impose on the Treasury, this $10 increase? I refer to the increase carried in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The cost of the bill for the first year will be approximately $10,800,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield myself five additional minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Those figures are on the assumption that there are no deaths; but if the widows continue to die at the rate of 1,100 a month, as under present conditions, the additional sum carried by this bill will be negligible.

Mr. MANLOVE. Then at what rate are the widows dying?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may say in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, that according to the figures furnished our committee, during the month of December, 1927, 1,569 widows died or their names were dropped from the rolls of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am also informed that during the past year approximately 11,000 widows have died. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I call attention to the fact that while a certain number of these widows will die every year, a certain other number will be coming on, arriving at the age of 75 years, so that they will take up all of this increase.

Mr. MANLOVE. And for what period of time does the gentleman think that these poor old widows will continue to come on?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. But some of us are interested in finding out whether the President of the United States is going to veto this bill, as he did the soldiers' bonus bill.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I do not think that would be very good politics at this time.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the gentleman has overlooked the most important feature of the bill, in the fact that a woman who has been married to a Civil War veteran since 1905, 23 years, deserves the extra $10 a month as much as if she had been married to the veteran a day previous to the 27th day of June, 1905. If it were possible, I think this bill should be rereferred to the committee, and we should strike out any reference whatever to 75 years of age. A woman certainly deserves the $10 a month extra regardless of whether she reaches the age of 75 years or not, if she was married to the veteran before 1905. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think what the gentleman says is true. I do not believe that we ought to fix an arbitrary date or age. If a widow has lived with a veteran for 15 or 20 years continuously and has cared for that veteran and ministered to his wants as a dutiful wife, certainly she is deserving, regardless of an arbitrary marriage date or age.

Mr. MANLOVE. But under the gentleman's own argument does he not fix a date when he says that if a widow has lived with a veteran for a period of 15 years? In his own mind he is fixing a date back to the beginning of the 15-year period.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. As it is now, only those who were married prior to June 27, 1905, have a pensionable status.

Mr. MANLOVE. That is all right, but the gentleman does not want himself understood as saying that he would eliminate the period of date. Some young women may have married old soldiers a few days ago, without limitation of date.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Suppose a woman married a veteran.

Mr. MANLOVE. On what date?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In June, 1905, and lived with him up to the present time. Then she has lived with him for approximately 23 years, and I say, regardless of the date, if she has lived with him for that time she certainly should be considered as having earned some consideration.

Mr. MANLOVE. But that is quite a different proposition. The gentleman said that he would eliminate both date and age.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would in this bill, but I would include an amendment to the effect that she must have lived with the veteran continuously for a reasonable period of time and have cohabited with him for, say, 15 or 20 years.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GREENWOOD. As I understand the gentleman, in referring to the arbitrary date of June 27, 1905, that law was passed about 1917. At that time the widow would have lived with the soldier about 12 years, in order to obtain a pension. Maintaining that arbitrary date down to this time, the widow would have lived with the soldier for 23 years. If it was right, when it was first passed as an arbitrary date, it is not equitable now, and the point I understood the gentleman to make is that instead of fixing an arbitrary date you should require a period of time that they should have lived with the soldier and at the time of his death have lived with him for 15 or 20 years. Then the time or the date will follow, as the time goes on, and they will all be treated on an equitable basis of time they have lived with the soldier, so that the arbitrary date fixed some years ago can not be right now.

Mr. MANLOVE. I agree with the gentleman, if that is the point he contends for.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman agrees with the gentleman from Ohio on that point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; that was my contention. I do not care to take further time, but I do want to discuss the present system that has grown up in the House of granting increases of pension by special act.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield myself two additional minutes. The present system of increasing widows' pensions by private pension bills is discriminatory, unfair, and unjust. As a result of this system, a few widows, by the activity of their Representatives in Congress, secure a pension allowance of $50 per month, while the great majority of widows are denied this relief and compelled to get along on $30 per month. Manifestly, it is unfair, giving a few thousand widows $50 per month by private pension bills and denying that allowance to thousands of other widows who are equally aged, equally infirm, equally indigent, and equally deserving. All are practically on the same basis in reference to age, health, and financial condition. All should be treated alike. Thousands of widows are discriminated against unintentionally, thus favoring a few.

The action of Congress in this respect is unfair, unjust, and inequitable. We should correct these abuses and the favoritism that has grown up under our system of granting increases in pensions by private act. Thousands of special bills have been introduced at this session. The chances are that few of them will be acted upon. No doubt the most of them are meritorious claims. We can only relieve this intolerable condition by passing a fair and equitable general law which will provide for the payment of a pension of $50 monthly to those widows who have a pensionable status under our general pension laws.

We have pending before our committee to-day several thousand bills, special acts, introduced by Members of Congress, granting to widows an increase of pension from $30 to $50 a month. Practically all of us introduce such bills. I am informed we may not have an omnibus pension bill during this session. The investigator of our committee is unable to examine and give attention to all the special bills introduced.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why can not the committee get a couple more investigators? Does the gentleman mean that Members of Congress are going to discriminate in favor of one widow as against another who is just as infirm?

Mr. MANLOVE. I want to say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has less appropriations for it than it is entitled to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I do not believe it is the intention of Members of Congress to discriminate, but our omnibus pension bills only include those meritorious cases which are brought to the attention of our committee by Members of the House or Senate. We all know that for every worthy case relieved there are hundreds of other cases equally meritorious that do not receive consideration because the claimants' condition has not been brought to the attention of some Member of the House or Senate. Relief by special act is unfair to a certain extent, unintentionally and without fault on the part of the membership of the House. We should either discontinue the practice of passing special acts or pass a general pension bill that is just and equitable to all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD] to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand why pension bills, and especially this bill, is brought up for consideration on the floor of the House under suspension of the rules. Such consideration limits debate to 20 minutes to those in favor of the bill and 20 minutes to those opposed to the proposed legislation, and amendments are not in order and can not be considered. Discussion of the bill by the House membership on the floor is out of the question owing to the limited time. A number of the Members of the House would like to discuss the merits and demerits of the bill and offer and discuss meritorious amendments.

The only way a Member can voice his approval or disapproval of the bill, or inequalities in the bill which should be cured by amendments, is to take advantage of the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD. I am taking advantage of that privilege as the only way I can register my views on the proposed legislation. It is necessary to vote the bill up or down, and we are required to support the bill, with all its defects, for the good there is in it, and at the same time take it with all its defects and inequalities.

That is bad practice. I do not think the House would go wild on legislation of this kind in their desire to do justice. I believe an opportunity should be afforded to propose and consider amendments that would add materially to the general benefits of the bill. This bill does not go as far as it should.

At the last session the Invalid Pensions Committee reported favorably to the House a bill recommending a uniform increase to $50 per month. Why the change of the committee's attitude at this session in reporting a bill to make the uniform allowance of but $40 per month is more than I can understand. I am pleased to see that eight members of that committee are in accord with my views and have joined in a minority report. It ought to be at least $50 per month and I am sure the membership here, if they had an opportunity to vote directly on the proposition, would make a uniform allowance of $50 a month.

The Government can afford to be liberal to its defenders and their widows and adequately provide for them in their declining years. Most of these widows are from 75 to 90 years of age, feeble and infirm, unable to work and earn a living, and many of them are practically destitute. They have ministered with love and kindly affection to our country's defenders and added to their peace and contentment in their declining years.

Reports show that the mortality rate is about 11,000 a year. But a few years more and all will have passed away. We should add to their comfort, peace, and happiness in their declining years. They have performed noble service in ministering to the wants and needs of those whose patriotism and sacrifices and hardships have insured the perpetuity of our Government.

Another most glaring defect in the bill is that which permits the pensionable status to remain as of June 27, 1905. Either the date of the pensionable status should be moved up to a later period or the status should be based upon the number of years the widow lived with her soldier husband, administering to his necessities and comforts. Thousands of widows throughout the country were married to their soldier husbands subsequent to June 27, 1905. No relief whatever is provided these widows. They should have been taken care of by amendment to the bill.

The law first fixing the pensionable status as June 27, 1905, was passed in 1916. The date of the pensionable status was then fixed 11 years prior to the enactment of the law, so that a designing woman would have no incentive in marrying a veteran primarily for the purpose of getting a pension for life upon his death. Twenty-three years have elapsed since the date fixed for determining a pensionable status. The reason for fixing this pensionable status at the arbitrary date of June 27, 1905, has ceased. Either that date should be fixed about 1920 or the pensionable status should be determined on the basis of marriage relation existing for some 10 or 15 years prior to the death of the soldier.

Special bills will continue to be filed to take care of these widows who have been married subsequent to June 27, 1905, and the congestion of private bills in the Invalid Pensions Committee will be relieved but very little. If I had my way about it, I would fix the pensionable status at 10 years existence of the marriage relation prior to the death of the soldier. The widow who lives with her soldier husband and administers to his wants and necessities for a period of 10 years is in justice entitled to a pensionable status. If widows who had been married and lived with their soldier husbands for a period of 10 years up to the time of the soldier's death were granted a uniform pension of $50 a month, a greater degree of justice would have been done to these surviving widows.

As the bill is it does not do justice to these widows who have so nobly and valiantly stood by their soldier husbands and ministered to them in their declining years. I believe such a bill would have passed the House by an overwhelming vote and I do not believe there would be just grounds for Executive disapproval, in view of the fact that these widows are so rapidly passing away. In the month of December, 1927, 1,569 widows died, or their names were dropped from the pension rolls in the Pension Bureau.

With this rapid increase in the mortality rate, it could not be much of a strain on the Federal Treasury, and those of us who are sincerely interested and the citizens of America generally who are interested in seeing that our old soldiers and their widows are adequately provided for would have the satisfaction of feeling at least that justice had been done.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, House bill 10159 has passed the House. This bill provides an increase of pensions to widows of the soldiers of the Civil War when said widows have attained the age of 75 years.

This legislation will, no doubt, assist several thousand widows of veterans of the Civil War, and the increase will provide at least a means for securing the necessities of life during the remainder of their years upon earth.

In looking over a memoranda I notice a statement made by a former Senator from New Mexico five years ago, that at that time there were 488 widows of the veterans of the Civil War still living who were then 94 years of age or over; that there were 157,000 widows over the age of 74 years. Since that time the department states that many thousands of these widows have passed away, and that the widows are dying at the rate of 11,000 a year. During the month of December, 1927, 1,569 of these widows were stricken off the pension rolls.

The bill provides that widows who married the Civil War veterans before July 27, 1905, are entitled to the increase from $30 to $40 per month. So this legislation does not place on the pension rolls widows who married the veterans subsequent to July 27, 1905.

The mortality of these surviving widows is increasing rapidly at this time, and naturally must increase much more from this time on. The increase of $10 per month is provided for those who have passed the biblical period of threescore and fifteen, and who have heretofore been pensioned at the rate of $30 per month.

It is true that this legislation confers a great benefit upon some thousands of widows who do not at this time receive sufficient pension to subsist properly, or to receive the proper care necessarily required for their comfort at this age.

The committee report states that indications shows that many of these widows are helpless and sadly in need of this assistance. There are on the pension rolls of the Government 206,530 widows of Civil War veterans; these figures are of January, 1928.

The committee has conferred a real favor upon many thousands of these worthy widows in the passage of this bill. However, there remains this positive fact—that the age limit placed in this legislation is entirely too high, in requiring that the widow be 75 years old before she receives the increase of $10 per month. It would be more equitable and just if this age limit were 65 or 70 years instead of 75 years. The other branch of Congress feels more generous toward the widows; they have seen fit to favorably report a bill allowing widows of Civil War veterans a pension of $50 per month.

It is stated that the Government, from July 1, 1926, to June 30, 1927, paid out $83,763,158.37 for pensions to Civil War widows.

These figures bring to the American people an idea of the enormous cost of war not only in the money spent but entailment in expenditures that must follow in its wake, and in the untold sorrow and suffering which humanity must endure. Is there no solution to this problem? Who has offered a better solution than the great American President and statesman, Woodrow Wilson, in his plan for outlawing war through the League of Nations?

The American people should ponder over the results of war—how our manhood is ravished and the people are saddled with a burden almost unbearable. And yet it is our duty to protect those who have fought for our country—theirs should be a fair and generous reward. And second only to our duty to the veterans themselves, is our duty to provide for the widows.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Speaker, depending upon our action in the House to-day by passing or rejecting H. R. 10159, providing an increase in Civil War widows' pension allowances from $30 to $40 per month, will disclose to those dependents the feeling of gratitude or ingratitude of the citizens of our respective districts. By our attitude to-day we will convey to these dependents a message of appreciation of services well and nobly performed by Civil War veterans during the darkest hours of the Nation's peril. Should we reject this bill it will indicate our indifference, our ingratitude, and our unfriendliness.

By supporting this measure I believe I voice the sympathetic and humane attitude of the voters of my district, who may always be depended upon to give cheerfully and bountifully of their time and funds to espouse a worthy cause. If they could express their opinion, as I will do for them, the vote would be unanimous. They are grateful to all war veterans and not unmindful of the needs of their dependents, and I am sure they feel as I do, that while the Government is spending enormous sums for other purposes, it should provide an adequate pension for Civil War veterans' widows to the end that their declining years might be made as comfortable as possible.

If this bill passes fixing the pension at $40 per month, it would equal $1.33 per day. I am reminded that this sum must provide shelter, food, clothing, and medical attention. The question is, how can it be done?

Under the provisions of this bill, in order to receive the increase, these already aged women must have attained the age of 75 years. It would be interesting at this point to know how many of them ever reach that age—certainly not a large number. If the number is not large, by the same token the expense to the Government would be infinitesimal.

During this session the Senate reported a bill providing an increase to $50 per month. In view of this action taken by the gentlemen at the other end of the Hall it is hard to understand why this committee failed to report a similar bill. Can it be that we Members of the House place the purchasing power of the dollar at a higher point than the gentlemen of the Senate? Or do we fail to comprehend the urgent need of these dependents?

Physical infirmities and illness come to us with greater suffering and frequency at the age of 75 years, and if we are without the wherewithal to meet it, the toll is disastrous.

Mr. Speaker, in the Sixty-ninth Congress the committee reported H. R. 4023 providing an increase to $50 per month for Civil War widows. In the report submitted at the time it stated that—> the committee considered the bill an emergency measure; that whatever more is to be done for these old soldiers and widows must be done soon. They are fast passing to their reward, where a grateful Nation can do no more to pay the debt it owes to them. To-day the average age of the widows is nearly 75 years.

The last paragraph of that report stated that if the bill became a law, it would probably be the last expression of Congress to pay the debt of gratitude which the Nation owed these old veterans and their dependents; that in view of the rapidly decreasing numbers, the increase granted them by H. R. 4023 would not be a burden on the Treasury for long.

But the case was more succinctly stated to-day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD] when he said:

> The present system of increasing widows' pensions by private pension bills is discriminatory, unfair, and unjust. As a result of this system a few widows, by the activities of their Representatives in Congress, secure a pension allowance of $50 per month, while the great majority of widows are denied this relief and are compelled to get along on $30 per month. Manifestly it is unfair giving a few thousand widows $50 per month by private pension bills and denying that allowance to thousands of other widows who are equally aged, equally infirm, equally indigent, and equally deserving. All are practically on the same basis in reference to age, health, and financial condition. All should be treated alike.

Congress should not disregard this state of affairs. There should not be two separate pension laws for war widows. There should be no discrimination, especially by legislative acts. These cases are practically identical and should be so considered. Congress should no longer withhold the increase to all dependents that is now enjoyed by a fortunate few. Fifty dollars per month would meet the requirements more adequately than $40 would.

Congress may, and I hope will, in the near future take cognizance of this inequality and end the discrimination by passing a general law equalizing pension allowances to all dependents as a result of all wars.

Huge sums are appropriated annually to meet the requirements of governmental activities. The people of the Nation are not always in complete agreement as to the wisdom of or the necessity for many of these vast expenditures. I am sure, however, by providing adequate pensions for the dependents of American veterans of all wars, who have passed into the great beyond, American citizens, whom we represent in this House, will not only be in accord with, but will applaud our action for passing this bill.

Mrs. NORTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I do not like the provisions in this bill, H. R. 10159. I think it is most unjust and unfair of this House to grant these aged, worthy widows of the Civil War a miserly increase of $10 a month.

I understand the Senate Pension Committee has reported out a bill to increase these pensions from $30 to $50 a month. I am disappointed in the House that it does not agree with the Senate, and it only means a conference and I hope a victory for the Senate.

In the last Congress a pension bill passed increasing the pensions of widows of the Civil War from $30 to $40 a month, and what happened to it? It was "pocket vetoed" by the President in the closing days of the Congress. Will this bill meet with the same fate? What assurance have you that the President will at this time approve this bill?

In the beginning of the Seventieth Congress I informed the widows of the Civil War veterans in the twelfth district of New Jersey, whom I have the honor to represent, that I would file special bills for each and every one, requesting an increase in their pension to $50 a month. I have already filed some 27 special pension bills. I did this because of the fact that last year I introduced four special bills and intended to introduce more, but was advised by the Committee on Invalid Pensions that they intended to have a general pension bill passed, and to go along with the "economy program" of this administration. I accepted the advice of the committee and refrained from giving any additional work to the clerks of this important committee. What was the result? The four special bills I introduced were passed by Congress and approved by the President, giving four widows in my district $50 a month pension. It was not my intention to be partial to these widows, no matter how worthy they may be. How very unfair to the other equally worthy widows of Jersey City and elsewhere? Even had the President approved the general bill—I believe it was known as the Elliot bill, H. R. 4023—those four widows, by special legislation, were even then receiving an increase of $10 a month more than the remaining widows.

To justify myself I introduced a special bill, as I have previously stated, in this Congress for every widow of the Civil War in my district whose case was called to my attention. I am told there are 6,500 special bills referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and this bill to-day is the solution of the problem. I do not like the solution. It should have been $50 a month and not a dollar less.

Furthermore, I do not like the age limit, 75 years, before the widow may receive this increase in pension. Many of the bills I have introduced are for widows in the late sixties or early seventies and they would not come under this bill, yet are helpless and need almost constant care. I believe the age limit should be stricken out and let all those widows now on the pension roll be eligible for this increase as soon as the bill becomes a law.

Another unjust provision in this bill is the fixed date of marriage to the veteran, 1905. I think any widow who had been married previous to 1915 should come under this law. The Elliot bill included this recommendation, I believe, and it was a far more liberal bill than the one now considered.

I do not believe that the Members of the House are rising to the emergency. This probably will be the last act we will be able to perform for these aged widows of the Civil War and why not be more generous?

My hope rests with the Senate, that this august body will not be blinded by economy, but will see the light of truth, justice, and reward.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill provides for an increase in pension for widows of Civil War veterans now receiving $30 a month to $40 a month, provided they have attained the age of 75 years.

The bill can not be amended, a motion to recommit is not in order, and the debate is limited to a few minutes. It is another case of accept what is offered or vote against the bill. To defeat the bill would deprive a few widows of a $10 increase in pension, and nothing would be gained by such a vote.

If the opportunity was afforded for amendment, or even a motion to recommit, every Civil War widow would receive a pension of $50 a month, because there are not a handful of men in this House who would be willing to be recorded against such a provision.

The action of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in calling up this bill under suspension of the rules convinces me the House will not have an opportunity to consider any measure at this session, and Members given the right to offer amendments, if the bill provides additional benefits to veterans of any war or their widows, or seeks in any way to amend the pension laws or veterans' act.

Just a few minutes ago under similar conditions we were required to vote for a bill as reported extending the time for filing applications for adjusted compensation, commonly called bonus.

I would estimate that not less than 50 Members of the House at this session have introduced bills which, if enacted, would make the adjusted compensation law more equitable and just, but under the procedure no one could offer an amendment to the bill just passed.

I introduced a bill providing that if the man died within the time allowed by law to file an application and failed to do so, his wife, children, or dependent father or mother could file an application and be paid upon the same basis as though the man had filed himself.

Another amendment suggested would have enabled the wife, child, dependent father or mother to have received, not one-third, as they did receive if their relative had been killed in action, but the full amount of the adjusted service certificate. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] said, these glaring discriminations puts a penalty on a man because he was either killed in action or died before he had an opportunity under the law to make his application. There is not one man in the House who would have voted against this bill if the two amendments referred to had been offered and adopted.

While this is a glaring discrimination, the provision in the bill granting increases in pensions to widows of Civil War veterans, provided they have reached the age of 75 years, is likewise a glaring discrimination.

The law provides that any widow of a Civil War veteran who served 90 days or more and was honorably discharged is entitled to a pension, provided she married the veteran prior to June 27, 1905. Let me cite as an example of discrimination the case of a widow who at the age of 20 years married a Civil War veteran. She lived with him for over 50 years, nursed him in the closing days of his life. She has now reached the age of say, 71, 72, or 73 years. This widow, who lived with the veteran over 50 years, is not entitled to the increase. On the other hand, take a widow who married the soldier in 1904, when the average age of Civil War veterans was nearly 60 years, who was 52 or more years of age at the time of the marriage, she is entitled to an additional $10 a month.

The 75-year age limit discriminates against the young girl who married the soldier immediately after the war and who lived with him, raised the children, and cared for him in his declining years.

I sincerely hope the Senate will not only strike out this age limitation but will also raise the amount a Civil War widow shall receive in the future to $50 a month.

The country owes it to the veterans of the various wars, as well as to their widows, to assist them, if they were disabled or in their declining years, and I, for one, do not want to see economy at the expense of our veterans, no matter what war they might have served in.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, this bill (H. R. 10159) provides for an increase of pensions at the rate of $40 per month for widows of honorably discharged soldiers of the Civil War who served 90 days or more or who incurred disability in the line of duty, without regard to length of service, who were married to the soldier prior to June 27, 1905, and who are now or who may attain the age of 75 years.

This bill comes up under a motion to suspend the rules, and no amendment can, therefore, be offered to it, and we are compelled to vote for it as a whole without amendment or to vote against it.

I am going to support the bill for two reasons. First, I favor this increase, because I believe it is just and because under existing law any widow who married and lived with an honorably discharged soldier during the time of his service now receives a minimum pension of $50 per month. I think there should be no discrimination against any of these widows and that all should receive $50 per month. I am not, under the rules, permitted to offer an amendment to that effect, and while this bill only gives $40 per month, it is $10 per month more than they are now receiving, and I am going to vote for it for that reason.

In the second place, this bill goes to the Senate for consideration, and it is my hope that the Senate will amend the bill, increasing the rate to $50 per month, so that no discrimination may be made against any of these widows, and in that event if the bill comes back to the House with such an amendment I will be glad to give it my support and we may then get an opportunity to vote for such an amendment.

The Interior Department appropriation bill, now pending in conference, as it passed the House appropriated $210,000,000 for pensions. On June 30, 1927, there were 489,942 pensioners and of these 236,300 were widows, 2,321 minor children, 899 helpless children, 4,211 dependent fathers and mothers. In addition, there were 17 widows of the War of 1812 and 6 survivors of the War with Mexico.

The following table shows the amount paid to pensioners from the beginning of the Government to the end of the fiscal year 1927:

War of the Revolution	$70,000,000.00
War of 1812	46,172,521.05
Indian wars	31,513,894.62
War with Mexico	58,056,020.69
Civil War	6,951,413,812.70
War with Spain	239,227,907.53
Regular Establishment	78,381,522.64
World War	219,966.55
Unclassified	16,513,425.54
Total	7,491,499,071.32

The soldiers of the Civil War and their widows are decreasing in number very rapidly through death. During the past year 16,958 Civil War soldiers and 20,828 Civil War widows died.

I would welcome legislation which would give all of these widows of honorably discharged soldiers the same compensation, $50 per month, and if an opportunity is afforded I will vote for any amendment that will give them that amount and make no discrimination against any of them.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions felt constrained because of a possible false sense of economy to dissent from their more generous attitude of two years ago, when the committee reported, and the House passed, the general pension bill, carrying a pension of $50 a month to all Civil War widows who were married to the veterans prior to June 27, 1915. And since it was understood that this action on the part of the House was not in contravention of President Coolidge's economy plan, it is safe to assume that it is not out of harmony with the financial program to-day. Each month the number of these worthy, aged women, these soldiers of the home, these fireside nurses and comforters who have so faithfully stood by the soldiers of the war through all the vicissitudes of life, is becoming less and less, so that in no way can it be considered that allowing them even so small a pension as $50, much less $40, a month will the country suffer any great inroads on its exchequer. I am very loath to agree with this attitude on the part of the House, and sincerely trust that we shall be at least as generous as the Senate committee has been in reporting their bill with a $50 provision for these women who have reached the age where a little comfort and care are so much needed and so much appreciated. Surely we all know in these times of high prices for all the necessities of human existence that $40 will provide only the most humble and meager means. Let us give these wives and mothers of our country a livable pension; let it not be said that we are a forgetful people, a people who are so engrossed with our selfish accomplishments that we pass by on the other side and leave our neighbor to suffer for the want of the least human needs and comforts. Let us not "do the many things we ought not to have done and leave undone the things we ought to have done."

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Speaker, to-day we have passed House bill 10159. This bill provides an increase of pension to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War. The bill provides an increase from $30 a month to $40 a month. The widow must have been married to the soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, 1905, and reached the age of 75 years. Of course this bill will benefit thousands of widows, but I am against the policy of bringing soldier legislation before the House under suspension of the rules. We are only allowed 20 minutes' debate for those in favor of the bill and 20 minutes for those opposed. No amendments can be offered, and could not be considered if offered.

In the Sixty-ninth Congress we increased certain widows of Civil War veterans. It applied, however, to those widows who were married prior or during the Civil War period. The Invalid Pension Committee of the House reported favorably a bill increasing all widows' pensions to $50, but the bill was amended in the Senate to apply only to those widows who were married prior or during the Civil War period. I am in favor of increasing all widows' pensions to $50, and if the Members of this House were given an opportunity to vote on such a measure it would pass the House by a large majority. I believe this great Government can and should provide for those widows who are old and feeble and unable to work and earn a living. It seems to me that we should not hesitate to provide for those who gave up the best part of their lives to care for those gallant soldiers who fought for their country.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, in January, 1928, there were 206,530 widows of Civil War veterans on the pension rolls of the Government. The report further discloses that from July 1, 1926, to June 30, 1927, the Government paid out $83,763,158.37 for pensions to Civil War widows. With the present mortality rate of 11,000 a year, it is reasonable to presume that the death rate will increase from year to year. I desire to provide for them while they are living and not wait until they are gone to raise their pension. We should provide for their peace and happiness now.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the pending measure does not provide an allowance of $50 per month for all widows of Civil War veterans who are entitled to pensions. Only a few of these widows are still living and practically all of them are quite old, infirm, and without means of support. Many of them are blind, confined to their rooms or bed, or otherwise helpless. They are absolutely incapable of earning a livelihood, and many of them are destitute and require the constant care of a nurse or attendant. The long-established policy of our Government is to make provision for the comfortable maintenance of these aged women, and no one will contend that $30 per month will provide for the decent support of these widows.

As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I supported an amendment to this bill to make the monthly allowance $50, and every other Democrat on the committee wholeheartedly supported this amendment. For reasons best known to themselves our Republican colleagues on the committee saw fit not to join with us in reporting out this bill increasing widows' pensions to $50 per month. Moreover, the majority of the committee went further and wrote into the bill a provision denying this $10 increase to all widows who have not attained the age of 75 years. I opposed this provision for reasons which are perfectly obvious to everyone familiar with the facts in relation to the needs of these widows, without regard to their ages.

At the time the House Committee on Invalid Pensions was engaged in the task of emasculating this bill the Senate Committee on Pensions reported out a bill granting an allowance of $50 per month to all widows of Civil War veterans who are entitled to pensions under the general law. This indicates that the Senate looks with favor on an allowance of $50 per month to these widows, and if the House and the President had only gone along with the Senate undoubtedly the $50 proposal would have become a law. The sentiment of the Members of the House is overwhelmingly in favor of this increase, and if this bill had been allowed to come before the House for consideration as bills are generally considered it could and would have been amended by substituting $50 for $40 as the monthly pension allowance to the widows of Civil War veterans.

But no, "the powers that be" brought this bill before the House on a motion to suspend the rules, which meant that the bill could not be amended and would have to be "voted up or voted down." In other words, those in charge of the bill, by calling up the bill on a motion to suspend the rules, in a parliamentary sense, "bound and gagged" those who favored a more liberal allowance and prevented the bill from being amended in any way whatsoever. In this manner the majority party worked its will, although there would have been practically no votes in the House against increasing this allowance to $50 per month.

Therefore the responsibility for this denial of justice to the aged and infirm widows of Civil War veterans must and does rest squarely on the Republican leaders in the House. Not one of them will say that $50 per month is too much for these aged women who are dying at the rate of more than 1,000 each month. The only excuse I have heard urged by my Republican friends is that the President would veto a bill increasing widows' pensions to $50 per month. If Congress had passed this bill granting the $50 allowance and put the proposition up to the President I do not think that he would have vetoed the bill. But if the bill met with a veto, the responsibility would have been on the President and not on Congress.

Under our form of government it is the duty of Congress to enact such legislation as the Members may consider just and proper. We should do our duty as we see it without regard to the views of the President. After Congress has enacted legislation, the President has the right and power to approve or disapprove such legislation.

I believe this increase from $30 to $50 should be granted for at least two reasons: In the first place $30 is not an adequate allowance under present conditions and high cost of living; in the second place, this increase should be granted and a uniform allowance established in order to prevent unjust, inexcusable, and unreasonable discrimination between widows who are equally deserving, equally aged, equally infirm, and equally destitute. We should not "make fish of one and fowl of another." We should not grant increases to some widows and deny that increase to other widows whose claims are just as meritorious.

The calendars of the House and Senate are crowded with private bills to increase the pension allowance of certain widows from $30 to $50 per month. I have introduced numerous bills of this character and endeavored to secure their enactment. I never secured the enactment of a private pension bill that was not meritorious. But I want to call your attention to the discrimination and social injustice that is being accomplished under the present system of granting increases of pensions to certain widows by private acts. Take a little township, say, 6 miles square—any one of the many thousand similar townships throughout the Nation. In this township live five or six widows, each of whom under the general law is drawing a pension of $30 per month. One of these widows has a friend at court—one of these widows learns that there is a method by which her Congressman or her Senator can secure an increase of her pension to $50 per month. She gets into communication with her Congressman or Senator and he introduces a bill to grant her a $20 increase in her monthly pension allowance. Under the advice of her Senator or Representative she submits affidavits in support of this private bill. A favorable committee report is secured and this private bill is included in an omnibus bill that is enacted by Congress and approved by the President. This omnibus bill increases the pension allowance of a few hundred widows but grants no similar allowance to the many thousand other widows who are equally aged, destitute, and deserving. This one widow is shown favoritism over the four or five other widows in her township who have just as strong claims on the bounty of the Government as the widow who is given an increase by a private act. Under this system one widow in a community gets $50 per month while four or five other widows in that community who are just as old, just as infirm, just as destitute, and just as deserving must be satisfied with only $30.

Now, I am opposed to this discrimination. The monthly allowance to widows of Civil War veterans should be increased to $50, because that amount is none too liberal and is necessary to furnish these old women a decent living; and this increase is necessary in order to prevent social injustice and discrimination between widows who are equally deserving and equally in need of the Nation's bounty.

By granting this increase and establishing a flat or uniform rate for each and every widow we will be treating them all alike, prevent discrimination, and at the same time relieve the calendars of the Senate and House of thousands of private pension bills, only a small portion of which can be considered at any one session of Congress. By granting this increase we will place all widows on an equality, relieve Congress of the burden of enacting private pension bills, and do justice to all widows of veterans without showing partiality or favoritism to any. If this is done, only in very exceptional cases would it be necessary to introduce a private pension bill.

I call your attention to the fact that the House Committee on Invalid Pensions as far back as April, 1926, unanimously reported a bill increasing the pension allowance of widows of Civil War veterans to $50 per month, and that report urged that whatever is to be done for these widows "must be done soon." I assert that after the lapse of two years this emergency has been accentuated, and there is stronger reason than ever for this increase. If this increase was necessary two years ago, I would like to inquire by what process of reasoning the majority of the committee now recommends that the monthly allowance be limited to $40. I am also curious to learn why the Republican leadership in the House arbitrarily blocks this legislation, which is admittedly just and necessary.

But, Mr. Speaker, as we are denied the poor privilege of voting for an allowance of $50 per month to widows of Civil War veterans, and as we are, in effect, told that we must take $10 per month increase or nothing, I am voting for the $40 per month allowance, not because I think that amount sufficient but because our good Republican friends tell us frankly that if we do not accept the $40 allowance we will get no increase whatsoever at this session. I hope the Senate will correct this blunder and amend this bill so as to carry an allowance of $50 per month for these aged, infirm, and helpless widows.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record now, which is the first opportunity I have had in Congress, as being in favor of liberal pensions for veterans, their widows, and their dependents.

The widows of Civil War veterans have not been generously provided for by this most generous of all nations. Every widow of a Civil War veteran who is entitled to a pension should have not less than $50 per month.

The bill which is before the House at this time (H. R. 10159) is inadequate and is not a credit to the Congress or to the American people. It increases the pensions of widows of the Civil War from $30 to $40 per month, provided that they have reached the age of 75 years or more, and provided that they were married to their veteran husbands prior to June 27, 1905.

If I am correctly advised, this will benefit only an inconsiderable number of widows and the increased financial burden on the Government is almost negligible. The bill does not meet the situation at all. The emergency which exists is calling for immediate action and relief rather than a mere friendly gesture. This Government of ours can well afford to be just and generous, even liberal, toward the widows of those who bore the burden of the battle in the hour of our country's direst need.

With the high cost of living at the present time and the depreciated purchasing value of the dollar, $50 would not be the equivalent of $25, 15 years ago. Thirty dollars, which practically all of the widows of Civil War veterans are now receiving and which they will continue to receive if this bill is enacted into law, is wholly inadequate to live on. Surely an old woman can not live in any comfort or peace on $30 per month.

I understand, of course, that this bill is now before the House for consideration under a suspension of the rules, and that for that reason amendments to the bill are not in order and can not be considered. Therefore we must either vote for the bill as it is or vote against it. We can not change it.

I am not criticizing the Committee on Invalid Pensions which reported out this bill, nor would I presume to criticize or condemn any member of the committee or any Member of this Congress because of the bill. I know of the difficulties with which the committee has had to deal. I know that the committee is acting in good faith and with the thought that it is doing the very best thing possible under the circumstances, and that this small increase is the most that they can hope will become a law. I can not agree with the committee in this, and I claim the right of expressing my opinion as to what would be wise and as to what would be just in the matter.

If I am correctly informed this House has on two previous occasions passed bills granting a pension of $50 per month to widows of Civil War veterans. These bills, though passed by the House, were not enacted into law. Perhaps because of this fact the committee has brought in this bill in the hope that with this small increase it will become a law and that one-tenth of a loaf is better than no loaf. I firmly believe that the committee would like to report and have passed a bill increasing widows' pensions to $50 per month.

I understand that the Senate at this session has passed a bill providing a pension of $50 per month for widows of the Civil War. I would be very much in favor of this House concurring with the Senate in such action and trusting the fate of the bill to the generous impulses of the very able, the much-revered, and the high-minded patriot into whose hands it would then come. We would have done our duty, and if that bill did not become a law there would yet be time to pass this bill at this session.

Before a widow of a Civil War veteran can benefit by the passage of this bill she must be at least five years beyond the allotted three score years and ten. Many thousands of them will never live to enjoy any benefit from this bill and many more thousands of them who do live until they are 75 years of age will not live to enjoy for any length of time the increased pension granted by this bill. Seventy-five years is a ripe old age.

I call to mind a case where a young girl in her early twenties married a Civil War veteran more than 40 years ago. For almost 40 years she was a good wife to this old veteran of the Civil War and during the last 10 years of his life she nursed and cared for him as a loving mother would for her helpless child. The veteran has now passed on to his great reward but his widow, who has herself been stricken, largely because of her unselfish and loyal devotion to her veteran husband and is now practically helpless, will have to live another 15 years in comparative poverty under the terms of this bill, until her pension is increased $10 per month. Her pension should not be less than $50 per month right now. There are many such cases.

I call to mind another case within my personal knowledge where a good woman married a veteran of the Civil War in 1906 and actually lived with him as a good and devoted wife for more than 20 years. She is now a widow but can not draw a pension because she was not married to her veteran husband six months earlier than she was.

If amendments to this bill were in order I would like to offer an amendment to the effect that any widow who for 10 years has lived with and cared for a husband who was a veteran of the Civil War would be entitled to a pension of $50 per month.

As the bill now stands if a woman married a veteran of the Civil War prior to 1905 and lived with him one year or only two weeks she is entitled to a pension. I think this is discriminatory and inequitable; I think the pensionable status should not be fixed by date of marriage but by the length of service and the comradeship and the devotion she has rendered to her veteran husband. If an arbitrary date must be fixed, it should be moved back at least 10 years to 1915 instead of 1905.

It has been my observation that the wives of veterans of the Civil War are devoted to their husbands; that they take good care of them, and are worthy and deserving of the generosity of a Nation, which is grateful to the men, who risked their all for their country during its most critical hour.

The Bureau of Pensions has reported that 11,000 widows of Civil War veterans die each year, and that 1,569 of them died during the month of December, 1927. The vast majority of the surviving widows will soon have passed away, and the amount which it would take to increase their pensions to $50 per month, would never be felt by this great and almost unbelievably rich Nation. Many of them are helpless and in need of constant care and attention. Thirty dollars per month which most of them receive or $40 per month, which a few of them will receive under the terms of this bill, will not go far toward supporting an old woman, who is helpless or who needs the constant care and attention of another person.

To those who think that the cost to the Government of a pension of $50 per month to widows, would be considerable or would be felt by the Government, I say that it is not a matter of cost. It is a matter of obligation. It is an obligation which this Government assumed when the Civil War veterans were enlisted and sent to battle for their country. It is an obligation which this Government has never hesitated to acknowledge.

The people of this country expect their Congress to meet that obligation in the same generous and gallant spirit in which the dead husbands of these widows took up arms in defense of the Union.

To those who think that the cost is a matter of calculation, I would say, let the cost be considered when next an effort is made to plunge our country into war, for as surely as our country is plunged into war it becomes the duty of our country to care for and provide for the casualties of that war, the men who are disabled in that war, their widows, and their orphans.

I am going to vote for the bill because it does increase the pensions of some of these deserving widows, but I can not do so without giving clear expression to my thought that it is inadequate; that it does not meet the emergency that exists; that it is a mere excuse for a failure of more generous action.

It is my fond hope that before this session of Congress closes it will be my privilege, as it would be the privilege of a great majority of the Members of this House, to vote for a bill which will give to widows of veterans of the Civil War, a pension of not less than $50 per month. I now declare that I will cheerfully and heartily cooperate with other Members of this House of a similar mind to that end.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to include the following:

A few days ago a bill passed the House of Representatives to increase the pensions of the widows of the Civil War veterans from $30 to $40 a month. I know this small increase will be a great disappointment to the worthy women who ministered so faithfully to those loyal men who came to the rescue of their country in her time of need. Many of these veterans were sick and helpless for years before they passed away and these wives were faithful to the end and now, when they are aged and infirm, and their years are numbered, it seems to me the least we can do is to give them a pension large enough to provide at least the comforts, and perhaps a few luxuries, and an increase of $10 a month above what they are now receiving will not add much to their income.

I am in favor of at least $50 a month and with no age limit. Many of these widows married their soldier husbands when they were very young girls and have not attained the age of 75, yet they spent many years making a home, performing the duties of wife and mother, and in every way giving the best there was in them to carry on the partnership which they hoped would end in peace and comfort. Sickness, misfortune, and other unexpected things, prevented the saving for a rainy day and now, when these wives and mothers are too old to go out and make a living for themselves, they should not have to worry about where they are to secure a means to subsist the rest of their days. I am in favor of giving every Civil War widow now on the pension rolls $50 a month, without regard to age or date of marriage.

I understand the Senate has reported out a bill to increase these pensions from $30 to $50 a month and I trust, when it comes to conference, the House will agree to the increase to $50, as even that is small enough at best.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R 10151) to amend section 9 of the Federal reserve act.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is this about?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will say to my colleague that this is a bill which will permit State banks and trust companies to act as depositaries of public money provided they give the same bond as is required of national banks, and provided also they are members of the Federal reserve system.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended by adding thereto a new paragraph as follows:

"All banks or trust companies incorporated by special law or organized under the general laws of any State which are members of the Federal reserve system, when designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositaries of public money, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties, as depositaries of public money and financial agents of the Government, as may be required of them. The Secretary of the Treasury shall require of the banks and trust companies thus designated satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds or otherwise, for the safe keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JURISDICTION OVER LANDS IN NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1959) to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction over oil and gas leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior on lands in naval petroleum reserves.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection of the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction over and the administration and enforcement of all oil and gas leases on lands in naval petroleum reserves issued pursuant to the provisions of section 18 and section 18 (a) of the act approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 437), entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," are hereby transferred to the Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MUNICIPAL AVIATION FIELD, YUMA, ARIZ.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1154) to authorize the use by the county of Yuma, Ariz., of certain public lands for a municipal aviation field, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, subject to valid existing rights, be, and he is hereby, authorized to lease to the county of Yuma, Ariz., for the establishment and maintenance of a municipal aviation field, the east half of section 10 and the west half of section 11 in township 9 south, of range 23 west, of the Gila and Salt River base and meridian, Yuma County, Ariz., containing 640 acres, more or less,

SEC. 2. That said lease shall be for a period of 20 years, and be subject to renewal for a like period, on condition that the county pay to the United States a rental of $1 per year for the use of the said land: Provided, That Government departments and agencies operating aircraft shall always have free and unrestricted use of said field and the right to erect and install upon said land such structures and improvements as the heads of such departments and agencies may deem advisable, including facilities for maintaining supplies of fuel, oil, and other materials for operating aircraft, and that in case of emergency, or in event it shall be deemed advisable, the Government of the United States may assume absolute control of the management and operation of said field for military purposes.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TERRITORY OF ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8284) to authorize the payment of amounts appropriated by the Legislature of Alaska on account of additional duties imposed upon Territorial officers.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will withhold it; yes.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] had to go to New York on some important business, and he asked me to have this bill passed over without prejudice. I am not asking this for myself, but I would like the gentleman, if he can accommodate the gentleman from New York to that extent, to withhold his objection and let the bill be passed over without prejudice until he returns.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, which reported this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF UNDISPOSED LOTS, ST. MARKS, FLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9842) to provide for the survey, appraisal, and sale of the undisposed lots in the town site of St. Marks, Fla.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may cause all public lands within the Government town site of St. Marks, situated in sections 2, 3, 10, and 11, township 4 south, range 1 east, Tallahassee meridian, Florida, established by the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat.

664), to be surveyed into lots, blocks, streets, and alleys as he may deem proper and when the survey is completed cause said lots to be appraised by three competent and disinterested persons appointed by him and report their proceedings to him for action thereon. If such appraisement be disapproved the Secretary of the Interior shall again cause the said lands to be appraised as before provided; and when the appraisal has been approved he shall cause the said lots to be sold at public sale to the highest bidder for cash at not less than the appraised value thereof, first having given 60 days' public notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale immediately prior thereto by publication in at least one newspaper having a general circulation in the vicinity of the land and in such other newspapers as he may deem advisable; and any lots remaining unsold may be reoffered for sale at any subsequent time in the same manner at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and if not sold at such second offering for want of bidders, then the Secretary of the Interior may sell the same at private sale for cash at not less than the appraised value thereof: Provided, That the square embracing the lands now being used as a burying ground be set aside as a cemetery for the use of the town of St. Marks, Fla.: Provided further, That the municipality of St. Marks, Fla., shall have a right for 90 days subsequent to the acceptance of the plat of survey of said land to select and receive patent to any block desired for a public park, not exceeding 5 acres in area.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, beginning in line 21, after the word "Florida" strike out the proviso ending in line 25, and insert: "Provided further, That the municipality of St. Marks, Fla., shall have a right for 90 days subsequent to the filing of the plat of survey of said town site to select and receive patent to any two blocks desired for public-park purposes, not exceeding 5.5 acres in area.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SUBMARINE ACCIDENTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10437), granting double pension in all cases where an officer or enlisted man of the Navy dies or is disabled in line of duty as the result of a submarine accident.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter in all cases when an officer or enlisted man of the United States Navy has died or shall die as the result of an accident to a submarine vessel, said officer or enlisted man having been employed in duty on or in handling the submarine at the time of such accident the amount of pension to be paid the widow or dependents of such officer or enlisted man shall be double the amount of that authorized to be paid under existing pension laws should death have occurred by reason of an injury received in service in line of duty, not the result of a submarine accident: Provided, however, That in any event the widow shall be paid a pension of not less than $30 per month and $6 per month additional for each child under 18 years of age of the officer or enlisted man, and in the event of death or remarriage of the widow or forfeiture of title by her, or if no widow survives the officer or enlisted man, the rate of pension herein provided for a widow shall be paid to the minor children under 18 years of age of such officer or enlisted man, from the date of such death or remarriage of the widow or forfeiture of her title and in other cases from the date of the death of the officer or enlisted man.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, in line 10, after the word "minor," insert the words "child or."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

GOLD-STAR MOTHERS

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] may be allowed to extend her remarks on the subject of the gold-star mothers' bill passed to-day.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it does not need any words of mine to impress upon this Congress the one great duty to be performed, toward the heroic dead of the Nation who fell in the World War.

That duty is to provide transportation for American war mothers to visit the graves of their beloved sons, wherever they fell. By the passage of H. R. 5494 this sacred pilgrimage will be accomplished; and to fully realize what this means to such a mother, is only to read the letter of Mrs. Mathilda S. Burling, national representative of the Gold Star Mothers Association of America. This letter had such an effect on the Committee on Military Affairs that the bill was reported out unanimously at the first hearing on this bill. I feel sure it had the same effect on every Member of Congress, as they read the report of the committee.

Of the 77,771 who died in the American Expeditionary Forces, I am informed 30,812 bodies remain in Europe, buried in American cemeteries, which are maintained by the United States War Department.

The country which received such a sacrifice can not do less than send their mothers over the sea to pay their last tribute to the boys who never came back to them.

A pilgrimage to these hallowed shrines by 20,000 American gold-star mothers would be one of the most solemn and impressive events in our history. The expedition would be a mighty crusade for international peace.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, on these Consent Calendar days there should be some point at which every Member may be sure the House will stop. We could not finish this calendar to-day if we continued to an unreasonable hour. It seems to me that 5 o'clock is the proper point at which to stop in order to be fair to all. If we follow this plan every Member will know that when the hour of 5 o'clock is reached we are going to adjourn. If this is done no one will be specially favored or discriminated against.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. There are a number of bridge bills on this calendar. They are all in the regular form prescribed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Does the gentleman think it possible in a day or so to get permission to have those bridge bills considered, because we are very anxious to get them through and over to the Senate. There are no objections to those bridge bills.

Mr. TILSON. It has been the practice of the House in the past, when an emergency exists in regard to a bridge, to consider such bills on a day other than consent day, but to-day it seems to me that having reached the hour of 5 o'clock we ought to adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUDSON (at the request of Mr. MAPES), for two days, on account of death in family.

To Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SOMERS of New York, for two weeks, on account of illness.

To Mr. WAINWRIGHT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. WRIGHT (at the request of Mr. CRISP), for four days, on account of death in his family.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7032. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Canton, Ky.;

H. R. 7033. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Iuka, Ky.;

H. R. 7034. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Smithland, Ky.;

H. R. 7035. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the mouth of Clarks River;

H. R. 7036. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Eggners Ferry, Ky.; and

H. R. 8216. An act to confer authority on the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia to permit J. L. Sink, a bankrupt, to file his application for discharge and to authorize and empower the judge of said court to hear and determine the same.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 21, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. TILSON submitted the following tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Tuesday, February 21, 1928, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

To amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and authorizing appropriation of $150,000,000 per annum for two years (H. R. 7019).

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

368. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1929, amounting to $50,000, of which amount $10,000 shall be immediately available to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to complete an experiment in the grading of meats under standards fixed by the Department of Agriculture (H. Doc. No. 179); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

369. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation amounting to $50,000 for the fiscal year 1929, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct certain tests and experiments looking to the control of the cattle grub (H. Doc. No. 180); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

370. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of a bill for the relief of Frans Jan Wouters, Antwerp, Belgium; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

371. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation under the legislative establishment for the fiscal year 1929, in the sum of $323,000 (H. Doc. No. 181); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE

TUESDAY, February 21, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful God, Who art the fountain of all grace, the source of all wisdom and goodness, give unto us Thy servants the increase of faith, hope, and love that led by Thy spirit we may find our work a joy, and count all labor light that is undertaken out of love toward Thee. Thou knowest our frame, Thou rememberest that we are but dust. Intensify, therefore, our faith in spite of our frailty, flash upon our inadequacy the sunbeam of hope, and set the bow of Thy love in the cloud of our life, a token of a covenant between heaven and earth, spirit and matter, the warrant of our divine sonship through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ORDER FOR TO-MORROW'S SESSION, ETC.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, before we proceed with the morning business, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the business of the Senate to-day it shall adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, that at the conclusion of the reading of Washington's Farewell Address to-morrow the Senate shall adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon Thursday, and that immediately following the conclusion of the routine morning business on Thursday the Senate shall devote the remainder of the morning hour to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TAX REFUNDS (S. DOC. NO. 60)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with Senate Resolution 110 (agreed to January 27, 1928; by Mr. HEFLIN), a list by States of the names of persons to whom taxes have been refunded, amounting in each case to $25,000 or more, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. DENEEN presented a resolution adopted by the ninth annual convention of the American Legion, reaffirming its support of the immigration act of 1924 and of its fundamental national-origin provision that immigrant quotas should be based on the entire population and not on the foreign-born only, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Broome County (N. Y.) Bar Association, favoring the passage of legislation to relieve congested calendars in the Federal courts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM presented petitions of American Legion Auxiliaries, Unit No. 45, of Meriden; Unit No. 91, of Moosup; and Rau-Locke Post, No. 8, of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, praying for adoption of the proposed enlarged naval building program, so as to insure an adequate national defense, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented memorials of the Hartford (Conn.) Branch of the General Alliance of Unitarian and other liberal Christian women, and of 35 citizens of Cheshire, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against adoption of the proposed enlarged naval building program, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Connecticut Forestry Association, indorsing pending legislation to facilitate research into methods of forest production and conservation, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a letter from the Connecticut Nurserymen's Association, expressing the attitude of that organization relative to certain phases of House bill 9290, the so-called postal rate bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Buckingham Council, No. 14, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Norwich, Conn., protesting against repeal of the national origins provision of the existing immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from Lodge No. 37 of the Danish Brotherhood of America, at Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against retention of the national origins provision of the existing immigration law and favoring a quota distribution based on the census of 1890, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

PINK BOLLWORM INFESTATION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a telegram from the State Plant Board at Little Rock, Ark., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate all expenses incurred by the Senate, including necessary expenses for travel for Senators appointed by the Vice President to attend the ceremonies incident to the welcome accorded Col. Charles A. Lindbergh at Washington, D. C., on June 11, 1927.

REGISTRATION OF LOBBYISTS

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a report I am filing to-day from the Committee on the Judiciary, reporting favorably Senate bill 1095, to require registration of lobbyists, and for other purposes.

I am not unmindful of the fact, as I had occasion to say once before, that there are a number of men and women in this city representing associations or groups, not seeking to make private profit but who are of a class who are very useful public servants. There are men and women of high character. They frequently furnish to Members of Congress and to committees information that is very helpful; indeed; and there is no desire on the part of anyone I know of to limit their activities.

On the other hand, there is a class of people here who have fattened off the credulity of people living away from Washington, and have sometimes brought into disrepute legislation, and we want to reach them.

One can take up the telephone directory here and find a list of between three and four hundred associations who seek to capitalize every activity of the human race, but particularly they want to capitalize those things which appeal to people's emotions. There are societies for the preservation of constitutional government, there are societies for the protection of pedestrians, though I have never known anything they did for the pedestrian except to relieve him of some of his money, so that he can run faster, I presume, being lighter than he was before they got hold of him.

There are societies for the purpose of promoting installment buying. There are societies to induce people to eat cane sugar to the exclusion of beet sugar. There is a national society to coordinate the activities of people who are hard of hearing. There is a society for the study of negro life. What its activity is I have no idea. Whenever there is anything to which somebody, by his ingenuity, can induce some one else to contribute, there is formed a corporation or association, and money is collected from the credulous. Doubtless $99 out of every $100 goes into the promoter's pockets. The entire activity of some of these associations is to find out what is likely to happen and notify people and to take credit for bringing it about.

This proposed legislation reported favorably would require all these uplifters for their own pockets to go on record and state who pays them, how much they pay them, and what they do with the money.

One bright fellow from a city came here during the last session of Congress, and it developed he had collected around $60,000 from business men, who ought to have had intelligence enough to know that he was a fake. He reported that he spent $58,000 of it. Of course, he spent it by taking it out of their pockets and putting it into his.

There is another activity here which this legislation will hit if it passes. There have been any number of men, Members of either the House or the Senate, who were utterly unable to affect legislation seriously as long as they were Members of one body or the other. As soon as they are out of a job they become perniciously active in promoting legislation, and the very people who turned them out of office because they were not useful all at once take up the notion that since they are out of office they are tremendously influential. That opinion of the people is capitalized by these men. They have found out what was going to happen, they have notified the people back in the States, and they have collected commissions for the passage of legislation with the enactment of which they had no more to do than the man in the moon.

If we can pass this legislation, it will make them go on record as to who hired them. We are going to make them spread their contracts of record. We are going to make them state how much money they get out of their activities, how much they expend in promoting legislation, and in what manner they expend it. We are going to stop their activities just as the frost kills green vegetation.

The time has come, in my judgment, when people who are not familiar with what happens here in Washington should cease to be left the prey of men and women who have capitalized their hopes and their aspirations, and have extorted money from them under false pretenses. There are people here who are living off the credulous in other communities, who pretend that they influence legislation, who have not even a speaking acquaintance with a single Member of either branch of Congress, who would not know them if they should meet them face to face. Yet, they capitalize the fact that they are here, under some high-sounding name, to handle anything those away from here want done or do not want passed, and they collect money from them.

We hope that this bill will be educational, that the people who are paying out money under these false beliefs that they have agencies here who are influencing legislation will keep their money, and that the agents will find honest occupation and go to work.

There are set out in the bill the names of several of these associations. There is the American Pedestrians' Protective Association. I would like to have somebody tell me what useful purpose that has. I wonder if it is going to open a school to teach people to dodge Ford cars or to outrun a Buick. What kind of activity can it have? Yet, it rents quarters here, and has its literature; it has its people, and somebody pays the bills.

There is an American organization for the hard of hearing. What they do for the hard of hearing except taking their money I do not know. There is an American road-builders' association, an American sugar-cane league, an American taxpayers' league, an American veneer-package league. There is a tanners' association. There is a picklers' association, and there is a preservers' association. What they do, I presume, is quite well indicated by the names under which they associate themselves. There is a better-fabrics' league, a better-homes' league, a better understanding between industry and agriculture association, a national biographical society. The Lord knows what is not associated or incorporated or gotten together that will get money out of somebody's pocket here in the District of Columbia or in the States somewhere.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the tanners' association may be organized for the purpose of dressing the Republicans' hides after the next election.

Mr. CARAWAY. They have been very active in the past, and we will look into it.

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1095) to require registration of lobbyists, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 342) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENTS TO WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CURTIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

On page 25, line 5, strike out the figures "$12,668,944" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$12,981,775."

On page 25, line 13, after the word "Ferry," insert "Provided further, That not exceeding $286,831 shall be available immediately for the installation of a new heating plant at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and that $26,000 shall be available immediately for the purpose of paving that portion of the road across the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., connecting the State highways of Missouri and Kansas."

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. HARRISON each submitted an amendment, and also Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. TYSON each submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE BILL

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9198) granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Paris-Dover road in Henry and Stewart Counties, Tenn., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

RECODIFICATION OF MARITIME LAW FOR WAR TIMES

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 157) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the rules of maritime law in time of war as codified at the Second Hague Conference and in the Declaration of London were in important respects departed from during the late war; and

Whereas it is important as a condition of the limitation of armaments and of the orderly conduct of international relations that the rules of law as developed in the course of centuries be not left in doubt or uncertainty; and

Whereas the present chaotic state of maritime law—leaving the seas subject to no definite rules save that of force and commerce to no ultimate protection save that of battle fleets—constitutes an incentive for great naval armaments: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States believes:

First. That there should be a restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea.

Second. That the leading maritime powers of the world owe it to the cause of the limitation of armaments and of peace to bring about such restatement and recodification of maritime law.

Third. That such restatement and recodification should be brought about if practically possible prior to the meeting of the conference on the limitation of armaments in 1931.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LA FOLLETTE ON "DOMINANT ISSUES IN THE 1928 CAMPAIGN"

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, over the National Broadcasting Co. chain on the evening of Tuesday, February

14, 1928, under the auspices of the National League of Women Voters, entitled "Dominant Issues in the 1928 Campaign."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The progressive movement is constructive. It is the present-day phase of the age-long struggle to make government serve all the people.

Robert M. La Follette believed the principle of representative government sound; he believed that the people by intelligent exercise of the ballot can and will control their own Government. His purpose was not to destroy or even radically to change our institutions; it was to restore and preserve government as interpreted by Jefferson and defined by Lincoln.

Under his leadership the progressives achieved an impressive record of useful constructive legislation—State and National. Advanced measures, which in the beginning were denounced as "radical and dangerous," are now accepted as essential to the fulfillment of fundamental ideals of democracy.

It was on this basis that woman suffrage was attained. This weekly half hour on the air, given to the discussion of all sides of important public questions, sponsored by the League of Women Voters, is a striking example of the higher standards of citizenship being developed through women's equal share in government.

My father dated the beginning of our reform movement in Wisconsin back to the seventies, when the Granger organizations carried the question of railroad regulation to the courts.

Edward E. Ryan, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, rendered the opinion in the Granger cases, which laid the foundation for the final judicial decision upholding the right of the Government to control the railroads on the basis of common carriers.

Some 50 years ago, in an address to a Wisconsin University law class, after referring to the defiant attitude of a railroad corporation toward the State, Chief Justice Ryan said: "The question will arise in your day, though perhaps not fully in mine, which shall rule, wealth or man; which shall lead, money or intellect; who shall fill public station, educated free men or the feudal serfs of corporate capital."

Speaking as a progressive, I ask this radio audience to weigh that prophecy made by our great chief justice and to consider its application to the important problems pressing for solution in 1928.

Teapot Dome and Elk Hills naval oil reserves have been restored to the people of the United States by the final decision of the Supreme Court. This property of enormous value, stolen from the people by great oil magnates in collusion with members of the Cabinet, is now in your possession because of the courageous, determined fight made by progressives in the Senate.

The criminals have thus far escaped any legal punishment for the robbery and betrayal of the Government. The minions of Fall and Sinclair have been caught tampering with the jury impaneled to try them for conspiracy. This shocking development is being used to the advantage of the conspirators. It looks, as Senator NORRIS has said, as though the prosecutor might be found guilty and the defendant set free. He says further, "There has been such an abuse of power as must bring the blush of shame to every citizen of the United States who believes in the proper administration of the law and the proper trial of cases before the courts."

The power of the Senate to investigate transactions of the fraudulent Continental Trading Co. is defied by Robert W. Stewart, chairman of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana. He is one of the guarantors of the contract by which the money was raised by this Continental Trading Co. to purchase the Liberty bonds that passed from Harry F. Sinclair to former Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall in the Teapot Dome deal. Stewart refuses to testify where the rest of the two million or more dollars went.

Saturday, February 11, the cold, hard fact was brought to the attention of the world that a part of that stock of Liberty bonds purchased by the Continental Trading Co. from which Fall had received his bribe had been contributed to payment of Republican National Committee campaign expenses of 1920! Which shall rule—wealth or man?

You have seen how special interests are attempting to purchase seats in the United States Senate. In Pennsylvania and Illinois $3,000,000 were expended to secure the election of VARE and SMITH.

Revelations before the Special Committee Investigating Campaign Expenses demonstrated that Samuel W. Insull, head of one of the greatest public-utility combinations, was contributing, contrary to the law of Illinois, large sums of money for political purposes.

The progressives have consistently resisted these brazen attempts to corrupt government through the excessive use of money in elections. It is a part of the progressive program to secure the passage of an effective corrupt practices act which shall restrict the amount and character of campaign expenses in both primary and general elections.

This is the electric age. The control of electric power is certain in the near future to dominate industry and transportation, and to vitally affect the comfort, convenience, and welfare of the home and the farm.

The attempt to monopolize electric light, heat, and power is the most alarming development of the last decade. Gigantic interlocking organizations are taking enormous toll from the consuming public. A complicated structure of holding companies, with countless subsidiaries, lends itself to the watering of stock and to the concealment of profit to an extent never before known. The investigation of the power trust proposed by Senator WALSH of Montana should have the active support of every user of electric current.

In 1924 5,000,000 progressive voters indorsed a platform pledge which declared: "We favor public ownership of the Nation's water power and the creation and development of a national superwater-power system, including Muscle Shoals, to supply at actual cost light and power for the people."

In compliance with that pledge the progressives have prevented the shockingly unfair lease or sale to the power monopoly of Muscle Shoals in which $150,000,000 of the people's money has been invested. They have supported the Boulder Dam bill for the development of power and the control of floods on the Colorado River.

We know that in Cleveland, Seattle, Los Angeles, and many other cities, the public operation of power plants has been a great success and of very great benefit to the people in reduced rates and improved service.

We have constantly before us the example of the Province of Ontario, in Canada. There one of the greatest power projects in the world, publicly owned, is furnishing electric energy to more than a million consumers at cost.

The average cost of electricity for the domestic consumer in Ontario was, in 1926, less than 2 cents per kilowatt-hour. In contrast to this, the average cost of electricity to the domestic consumer in the United States in 1926 was 7⅛ cents per kilowatt-hour. Our neighbors across the border pay less than one-third for domestic current from a publicly owned plant than consumers in this country pay to a privately owned monopoly, which gets its current from the same source.

* * * * * * *

Supremely significant, also, is the issue of farm relief. The basic industry, agriculture, struck down in 1920 by the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board and the enactment of the Esch-Cummins railroad law, has been denied relief by the great eastern industrial and financial interests exercising their control over the President of the United States to secure his veto of the McNary-Haugen bill last year.

Agriculture must be based on an equality with every other industry in this country. The McNary-Haugen bill should be enacted at this session of Congress, a reduction in railroad rates upon farm products secured, a downward revision of exorbitant tariff duties on manufactured products achieved at the earliest practicable moment.

* * * * * * *

The great power of national taxation is being used to shift the cost of government and the burden of the war debt to the backs of the people. Since 1921 Andrew W. Mellon, fourth richest man in the United States and Secretary of the Treasury, has succeeded in reducing the taxes on great wealth and the profiteering corporations by $3,000,000,000.

In spite of these enormous reductions, another drive is to be made to further distort the principle of graduated taxation by reductions upon the incomes of the rich.

The Federal inheritance tax is marked for slaughter because it is the only means by which at this late date those who profited so tremendously during the war can still be made to disgorge some of their ill-gotten gains and to bear a share of the cost of the war.

* * * * * * *

Most vital to the public welfare are the issues raised by our foreign policy. In China, Mexico, and Nicaragua the present administration has pursued a course which has carried the United States a long way on the road to imperialism. The policy is shaped by the international bankers and exploiters. This policy has been carried out in violation of the expressed will of Congress and the people.

In Nicaragua the President has gone so far as to create an actual state of warfare without the consent of Congress, which, under the Constitution, has sole power to make war. Unless this precedent is repudiated, then any President in the future may plunge this country into war by the mere scratch of the pen.

Progressives are opposed to the doctrine that the flag follows the dollar. They are against the use of the armed forces of the United States in exploitation of weaker nations or in the collection of speculative investments made abroad by international bankers. These foreign loans now amount to $14,000,000,000.

Carried to its logical conclusion, the Coolidge-Kellogg foreign policy means that we must have the largest Navy in the world, a standing Army of tremendous size, and universal conscription in order to look after these billions of dollars invested in all parts of the world.

The progressives in the Senate are asking an investigation of the foreign relations of the United States in Central and South America to the end that a constructive policy of noninterference in the domestic affairs of those countries may be formulated and agreed upon.

Progressives are fighting the $3,000,000,000 naval building program as a wasteful expenditure of the taxpayers' money and as creating a spirit of rivalry in armaments endangering the peace of the world. As Senator BORAH has said: "This program, together with the wild and excited statements about war (by our naval admirals), is sheer madness." Those who agree with him should act promptly on his suggestion to make their protest heard if they would prevent this madness from becoming a fixed national policy.

I regret that time forbids me to speak of other most important issues on which the progressives have taken an independent stand—flood control; the Federal reserve system and speculation; railroad valuation; conservation; the packing of our Government commissions and courts with agents of special interests; the use of injunctions in labor disputes.

Before closing, I want to speak of Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, as the accepted leader of the progressives in the Senate.

For a quarter of a century in House and Senate, Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS has fought the good fight and kept the faith with the common people—the progressive, unprivileged masses of America. The Senator from Nebraska has won the abiding confidence of the people of his State and Nation, and of the progressive millions everywhere, because during 25 years of public service he has demonstrated that party bosses, their corporate masters, and all their lobbies at the National Capital can not deceive him, nor intimidate him, nor stop him in his patriotic service for the common good.

Able, fearless, and incorruptible—beloved by friend and respected by foe—veteran of a thousand battles for freedom, justice, and clean government, he stands to-day the acknowledged champion of the rights and interests of the American people.

"Who shall fill public station—educated free men or the feudal serfs of corporate capital?"

UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD some communications and articles on the question of unemployment, concerning which I have heretofore introduced a resolution.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 20, 1928.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Washington, D. C.:

Unemployment conditions abominable. Call for Senate investigation to face facts.

EAST SIDE UNEMPLOYMENT COMMITTEE.

[From the Survey Graphic for March, 1928]

SHADOWS OF PROSPERITY

By Leo Wolman

There is mounting evidence of unemployment—a situation so serious that were it true of the stock market, there would be grave public concern. We have felt it a special charge on Survey Graphic, and turned to an economist who has spent the last three years in study of the labor market with these questions: How much unemployment? What are its causes? Why do we hear so little of it?

First of all, this American prosperity which has confounded observers the world over, is at the most only 5 years old. It began somewhere in 1922. It has been characterized by keen competition, falling labor cost, and revolutions in industrial technic and management. The automobile industry has played a large part in it. Fifteen years ago that industry was new; it is now no longer new. It may not yet have reached its saturation point, but it is certainly much closer to it than it has ever been. Meanwhile the construction industry has by common consent passed the peak of its postwar boom. In the smaller cities, building labor has suffered and, even in New York, reliable witnesses report considerable unemployment. Presumably during the past two years, and more particularly during 1927, these two extraordinary factors, favorable to the continued absorption of displaced labor, had begun to peter out and unemployment on a scale and of a character not unlike that known to our industrial districts before the war appeared again in this country.

In gauging its extent and significance to-day, it should be understood at the outset that there is no direct and satisfactory measure of unemployment in the United States. Witness the astonishing discrepancies in the estimates considered by the President's unemployment conference in 1921, which varied from 3,500,000 to 5,500,000 persons. We have in this country no adequate administrative machinery for registering the unemployed or for recording their passage from one job to another, and until we do we shall continue in the dark regarding the magnitude and character of the most difficult of our modern industrial problems. Trade unions play so inconsiderable a rôle in the bulk of American manufacture that their records can not be expected to yield the information they supply in many countries. For the present, therefore, we are thrown back on data that leave the most puzzling questions unsolved.

What these questions are it is easy to see. Since the war—and in some cases before—various Federal and State labor departments have been publishing monthly the number of persons employed in manufacturing industries and the total wages received by them. Wherever collected and by whatever methods they are checked, these figures appear always to tell the same story of a steady decline both in the number employed and in total wages, although the decline in employment is greater than in wages. Thus the most recent figures of the United States Department of Labor show that the number employed in manufacturing industries was nearly 12 per cent lower in 1927 than in 1923, and the wages paid almost 8 per cent less. Independent investigations appear in general to confirm this trend. If there were no conflicting factors, it would be simple to draw the plain conclusion from these figures that something like 10 per cent of our factory population were unemployed in 1927.

Students of the matter concede this continuous and substantial decline, but point to the growth of new alternative employment which, in their judgment, has furnished work to those laid off by manufacturing industries. And there is the statistical rub. The employment statistics of the railroads reveal a steady decline in the employment of railroad labor. The mining industry appears to be in position to meet the needs of its market with a smaller and smaller labor force. There remain only two great occupational groups: Construction on the one hand, and on the other trade, commerce, and clerical work. The last includes conveniently clerks, stenographers, sales people, chauffeurs, attendants at filling stations and in garages. On the two important categories we have no statistical series in any measure as adequate or as reliable as those for manufacturing, railroading, and mining. Figures collected and published by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce indicate an enormous growth in the operations auxiliary to automobile making. But, while they are indicative of an actual trend, they can lay no claim to accuracy nor can they be used to estimate the volume of absorption of factory labor afforded by these new occupations. The construction industry likewise grew during its boom period prior to 1927; but its growth, like that of manufacturing industries, was characterized by an increasing output per man, the effects of which on employment we have no present means for measuring at all.

What, then, are the probabilities? My cursory analysis of the present and immediate past has not considered crucial factors that have already exerted a considerable, and far from ameliorative, influence on the prevailing state of affairs. Along with the increase in efficiency of American industry there has been steady growth of our potential working population, and this in spite of immigration restriction. The progressive industrialization of negroes and of women and the discovery and utilization of a growing working population in the South have already done much to aggravate the problem of unemployment. They will, in all probability, make it even more difficult in the near future. For in a period of severe competition, which is so characteristic of the present phase of our business cycle, the drive for lower costs and cheaper labor is likely to continue.

Our contemporary unemployment, also, has already assumed peculiar characteristics. An efficient mechanized industry inevitably puts a premium on youth. Lay off, whether because of business slack or of improved technic, is more and more likely to affect the older workers. Such devices as old-age pensions and mass insurance, which in American industry have assumed amazing proportions, contribute to the same result, since all such life insurance and pension plans are cheap only as long as the average age of the insured is low. If these trends, already discernible, pursue their natural course, how to handle the problem of unemployment among the retired workers of industry will severely test our resourcefulness and ingenuity.

That a substantial volume of unemployment is prevalent at the present time is indisputable; equally so the existence of forces that may bring in their train waves of even more severe unemployment. All the more surprising, therefore, has it been that conditions such as have existed in this country for a year past have elicited so little public discussion and caused so little public concern. One common explanation is that the unemployed American worker has suffered little actual distress because he draws, while he is unemployed, upon his accumulated savings or investments. That the financial reserves of working men in this country are far in excess of those abroad is unquestionably true. But that they are sufficient to tide them over a substantial period of unemployment is highly doubtful and certainly not capable of statistical demonstration. We have only guesswork to go on when it comes to this central problem of the capacity of the American working man to meet the various risks and uncertainties to which he is exposed.

It is at the same time clear that much of the general apathy is due to another cause. The people who are "up against it" lack any effective machinery of expression. Social protest periodically falls into disuse in this country. The million or more unemployed are separate and isolated individuals, represented by no labor organization or another agency like it. Each goes his own way. Once such a workman drops off the pay roll, he is no longer even a member of a company union and that agency ceases to voice his grievances or to be concerned with his problems. The fact of the matter is that the vaunted efficiency and stabilization of American industry has not led to a stabilized labor market. The worker who loses his job is thrown upon as disorganized and anarchic a labor market as ever existed in this country. The more advanced employment and personnel departments of private industry, products of the war and its lessons, do not find their social counterpart in an integrated chain of public employment offices, whose function it would be to serve the interests of that large number of workingmen who are from time to time on no employer's pay roll.

If it is sound industrial and business policy for an individual employer to organize his own labor market scientifically, it is clearly sound social policy for American industrial society as a whole to procure the most efficient organization of our labor market as a whole. The wastes of the old methods of employment, now largely discarded by the more enlightened of American employers, still inhere in the general labor market, where the unemployed often receive no service at all or become the prey of sharks.

Within a single industry, and more often a single factory, the stabilization or regularization of industry still seems largely illusory. Pay rolls, except for the all too short periods of the height of prosperity, fluctuate with frequency and with violence. Workers are added when business improves and are dropped when the tide of business turns, much as they seemed to be in the years before 1920. Establishments that have achieved regularization or that have made provisions for their unemployed workers do not appear to loom larger, with the passage of time, in the total industrial situation. American inventiveness, which has resulted in such outstanding contributions to the problems of management in its relation to production, has not been invoked to meet the far larger problem of stabilizing the incomes and regularizing the work of the industrial workers of the country. Industry is apparently still unprepared to define its obligations toward the men and women who constitute its working force and admit that hiring and firing involve profound social consequences.

This, it would seem, is the root of our present and our future unemployment problem in American industry. The evidence, difficult as it is to use it in the face of prevailing optimism, points unmistakably to the inability of industry to exercise effective control over its own fluctuations. Those who first and most seriously suffer the effects of business and industrial instability are the manual laborers. They become all too frequently the charges of an indifferent and unorganized community. This country is rich beyond all imagination in human and material resources. More than any other country in the world we are in a position to experiment intelligently with neglected social problems. In the matter of unemployment we have at our disposal the experience of the many countries of Europe which have for years devised their own peculiar methods of dealing with the problem. We are in a unique position both to organize the general labor market and to make provision for the unemployed. We have the resources and the talent to fashion administrative measures that should insure the benefits and avoid the weaknesses of earlier experiments. We will do so when our leaders are alive to their social responsibilities.

Is Unemployment Here?

By Beulah Amidon

For the first time in seven years unemployment is on the front page. It is not there as a local situation—a Ford lay-off, a coal strike, a textile mill cutting its work week. This is large scale unemployment, men idle in every industrial center because they can not find jobs. Wage earners the country over face the reverse of that rosy picture of "unprecedented prosperity" at which we have gazed so long and so enthusiastically.

For some time there have been warnings of a falling employment barometer—an increase in the ratio of applications to placements in the public employment agencies, many more applications for home-work permits in large industrial cities, a steadily mounting number of men seeking shelter in homes for the homeless—bad weather signs which few of us noted. With the beginning of 1928, distress signals, local, State, and National, began to go up rapidly. In New York, for example, the Charity Organization Society, through its vice president, Otto T. Bannard, president of the New York Trust Co., sent out a general appeal for "help in this crisis," stating that it is "probably the worst we have had since 1921. Long lines of men wait here every day in the hope of finding work. When even the young and able-bodied are being laid off, can you imagine how hopeless it is for men who are ill or no longer young?" Governor Smith asked the State industrial commissioner for an immediate report on unemployment "to determine whether the State of New York, with its large public-works program can do something toward relief of this situation." And at Washington, the Jones bill, providing for a program of emergency public works, at length becomes news. It embodies recommendations of the President's unemployment conference, which met in 1921, under Herbert Hoover's chairmanship, and which had gone unheeded for seven fat years.

A fortnight ago, a member of the Survey staff gathered up a sheaf of reports from unrelated groups in widely scattered cities in all of which there was mention of acute local unemployment. These were spread out before a labor economist, and the economist was asked: What does this mean? Is there general unemployment? How much is there? Where is it? Why?

"There is no crisis, not in the accepted sense," said the economist. "This has been coming for a long time, slowly, like a glacier. Nobody has paid any attention. We have no general system of labor exchanges or unemployment insurance, making it to our immediate interest as a nation to know how many men are out of work and why and where. If we want to get a picture of the situation, we have to pick up bits here and there and piece them together. Why don't you take your questions to the family welfare agencies? They get the first impact of unemployment."

The family welfare agencies of 22 cities outside New York replied to our request for facts about their unemployment situations. Differences in record keeping and in division of responsibility among the agencies of the several communities make it difficult to compare these reports. It is clear, however, that case loads in industrial communities are markedly heavier this winter than last, and that there is a sharp increase in the number of families forced to seek help because of involuntary unemployment.

In Buffalo, N. Y., where the heavier end of the unemployment load is carried by the city department of social welfare, the Charity Organization Society reports, "They are experiencing a worse situation to-day than in any year since 1921. For instance, in the week of January 6–12, 26 per cent of the applicants gave unemployment as the main cause of their difficulty. In the week from January 13–19, 29 per cent and in the week of the 20th to the 27th, 32 per cent * * * In the year July 1, 1926, to June 30, 1927, the department of social welfare spent about $310,050 in family welfare relief. They have increased their fund this year and have at their disposal $436,525. This increase has been sought on the basis of the pressure from an unemployment situation."

The general secretary of the Association for Community Welfare in Fall River, Mass., indicates more acute unemployment than her own organization's figures (see table) reveal: "When our income fell off, as our contributors were not drawing dividends, our policy was changed to put the entire burden of unemployment on the public welfare department. I happen to know that the department was giving relief to approximately 1,000 families the week of January 21, 1928. An ordinary case load for them is from 400 to 600 families. The head overseer of the department ascribed the increase to the local unemployment situation."

Based on the average number of wage-earners employed in the five years 1919–1923, the division of statistics, Massachusetts department of labor and industries, represents employment in manufacturing establishments in the State as 77.2 per cent, the lowest point since the depression of 1920–21. "Boots and shoes and cotton goods are the industries hardest hit," Stockton Raymond of the Family Welfare Society of Boston points out, "employment in the former being represented by 46.2 and in the latter by 62.5. At the public employment offices the ratio of applications to positions filled is higher than it has been for a number of years, reflecting the situation as described."

In Philadelphia, "there is considerably more unemployment this year than last, and the number of applications coming to us (Family Society of Philadelphia) is exceptionally heavy. * * * Last November we received 307 applications, which is a larger number than in any November since 1918, the November of the influenza epidemic. In December, 1927, we received 340 applications, but there have been two Decembers since 1918 when we have received more applications than this. * * * It is exceedingly difficult to obtain jobs, and there is no doubt that, except for the winter of 1921–22, this is the worst period through which we have gone in 10 years."

In Portland, Oreg., "there is a decided increase in unemployment. At present there are probably 38,000 unemployed people here, which is an increase of over 100 per cent in our usual unemployment population."

"The unemployment situation in Milwaukee this year has been the worst since 1922," the general secretary of the Family Welfare Association reports. "However, the situation has not been serious enough to term it a crisis and all indications point to a decided improvement from February on. The situation might have been worse had the winter been more serious."

In New York, the State labor department reports that in December employment touched its lowest point for the year 1927, and that in January approximately 20,000 wage-earners were laid off. This pulls the index of employment "lower than it has been at any time since the trough of the depression in the summer of 1921."

The Industrial Bulletin of the department gives the number of workers registered for each 100 places open as 165.4 for December, 1927, as compared with 137.2 for November, 1927, and 116.3 for December, 1926.

A voluntary employment agency in New York City reports that in January, 1927, it secured 207 jobs for 265 applicants through 960 contacts. This January it was able to get only 140 jobs for 489 applicants, and over 2,000 interviews were required.

When jobs are scarce industrial home work increases. Nelle Swartz, director of the bureau of women and children, New York labor department, states that while the applications for home-work permits usually average 10 a day at this season, they now average more than 20.

Men and women are out of work in industrial centers, according to the available evidence, not because we face a sudden crisis, but because of slower and less dramatic influences—uncontrolled seasonality in many trades, gradual business recession, increased mechanization of industry.

"Among many causes responsible for the increase in unemployment is the substitution of machinery for hand labor," Richard A. Flinn, chief of the division of employment for the New York department of labor, states. "Steam shovels now excavate in building construction, subway construction, State road construction, which formerly gave employment to thousands of unskilled workers. Conveyors take the place of wheelbarrows in transporting building material to the building mechanic. In modern shops, conveying machinery carries the product in the process of manufacturing from the place where it enters as raw material to the place where it is placed by machinery on the freight car or motor truck. Many of these indoor jobs are not available.

"Electrical appliances, including the vacuum cleaner, washing machine, the electric iron, have curtailed the demand for casual women workers and the wet-wash laundry has lessened the demand for the casual laundry worker.

"Finally, the surplus of strong, able-bodied, unskilled workers has given the employer the opportunity to select more carefully and as a result the applicant who does not look strong and healthy or who is no longer young finds it exceedingly difficult to obtain employment."

Chicago has caught the backwash both from the Ford lay-off and the soft-coal strike. The city's widely heralded building and engineering program has brought an influx of men looking for jobs. At the same time, steel and iron, meat packing, and the clothing trades are "slowed up" and "freight tonnage has declined, throwing trainmen and dispatchers out of work."

Philadelphia and the New England communities suffer from the general depression in textiles. Fall River reports a 10 per cent wage cut in addition to a three-day work week.

In St. Louis "the increase in unemployment is probably due to a more complete shutdown in almost all types of factories employing both skilled and unskilled workers. * * * The industries in St. Louis are diversified, but we have noted that several of the large chemical companies producing patent medicines and drugs are not running full force, manufacturing plants making steel railroad cars are almost shut down, canning factories are employing only a portion of their usual force, and the clothing and shoe manufacturing companies, which represent the largest single industry in the city, are producing less than last year."

In Buffalo "the industrial situation as a whole has been bad this winter. The policy of retrenchment began as far back as July and has affected the whole economic situation. The building trades, steel and metal trades, the automobile and the auto-accessory manufacturers seem to have been our principal sufferers. * * * At the same time our local savings-bank deposits have increased quite remarkably. * * * Personally, I feel this is because of the quite general feeling that jobs are so scarce that those who are employed are putting away the maximum amount in savings accounts in order to meet the possible break in employment."

Portland, Oreg., reports that "all our local industries are involved, inasmuch as the principal industry which we have, lumber, is only at 50 per cent of its capacity, and you can see what the effect would be upon all the other local industries." A similar situation is reported from the United Charities of Dallas, Tex.: "The opinion of our staff is that there is more unemployment this winter than last winter. * * * There seems to be a general slowing down in all industries. The situation is not due to the closing down of any particular industry."

Three basic causes of widespread unemployment are set forth in this statement from Salt Lake City, Utah: "A great many of the mines in districts surrounding Salt Lake lay off men regularly each winter. These men pour into the city hoping to find work here. * * * In addition to the general business depression and the fact that we have so much seasonal work here, three of our largest concerns have laid off men, principally through the installation of improved machinery."

In the present situation there is little evidence that the country as a whole or that individual communities are adopting any sort of program for the relief of existing unemployment or for checking its spread. The survey's question, Is the community making any effort to alleviate the unemployment situation, such as a cooperative labor exchange or increased public work? is answered with an unqualified "no" by the family welfare agencies of Providence, Jacksonville, Little Rock, New Haven, Fall River, and Portland.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION AS SHOWN BY THE RECORDS OF THE FAMILY WELFARE AGENCIES

In Salt Lake City there have been "tentative group discussions but no definite effort made." In St. Louis, "the community council is proposing an employment bureau, which will not go into operation in time to affect the situation this year."

Cleveland reports that "there have been no special steps taken to alleviate conditions. The general feeling along the line was that the opening up of the automobile industry would be the greatest step to reduce unemployment." Youngstown, Ohio, increased public work "after March." "The only definite effort in Kansas City is an attempt to induce the county court to appropriate larger amounts for outdoor relief." In Dallas, "The city has increased public work on the streets and allowed only residents of the city to have these jobs. They permit the men to work one week, then lay them off and take on another group."

"I do not need to state that charitable organizations can not begin to meet the problems of an unemployment crisis," writes Joel D. Hunter, general superintendent of the United Charities, Chicago. "They not only can not, but should not. I have been trying to get the Council of Social Agencies to appoint a committee of leading business men * * * [to confer with city officials] concerning emergency measures to take care of the homeless men who are now sleeping in police stations, on floors of mission houses, etc. Second, to increase the number of jobs available. This can be done in two ways: By speeding up some of the public works. My information is that about $12,000,000 will be spent in public works in and around Chicago in the present calendar year. Also, by increasing the number of jobs in private business. I think this can be done if the telephone company will continue the work that it has already begun in installing dials and railroads place equipment orders."

The welfare council in New York City has appointed a committee, at Governor Smith's request, to cooperate with the industrial commissioner in his survey of the unemployment situation in both city and State. This request was telephoned from Albany to a gathering of some 200 social workers, representing nearly a hundred agencies. Bailey B. Burritt, general director of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, urged the following steps:

That Mayor Walker and the chamber of commerce be asked to consider active measures for increasing by 5 per cent the amount of employment in industry in New York.

That the city be asked to make $1,000,000 available for public improvements in such a way that the work can start at once.

That any city building program be advanced immediately and strenuously.

That the governor and the legislature be called upon to prepare plans for a more permanent remedy.

That the private citizens of New York be asked to increase by 10 per cent their donations to social-service organizations.

In spite of our experience in 1914–15 and 1921–22, American communities have paid little attention to similar "standard recommendations," our carefully set-up committees worked out to forestall or to alleviate just such a situation as now exists. The President's unemployment conference in 1921 not only mapped out such measures but instituted a searching study of business cycles and unemployment under the National Bureau of Economic Research. The conference's own committee on this latter phase of the subject brought out 10 major recommendations in 1923, covering not only such points as the collection of fundamental data, employment bureaus, and unemployment reserve funds, the responsibility of banks, the Federal reserve system, and public utilities, etc., but the control of private and public construction at their peaks. In line therewith the Jones bill has been before Congress for four years. As John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, summarizes it, it would "appropriate $150,000,000 for public works, including rural post roads, river and harbor improvements, flood control, and public buildings outside the District of Columbia. Work under this appropriation is to be undertaken only when it is apparent that a marked decrease of employment is under way in the construction industry of the United States. * * * Adoption of this 'prosperity reserve' by the Federal Government would be of further help by stimulating the creation of similar 'prosperity reserves' by States and cities."

As we read again of mass meetings and relief committees, of bread lines in the Bowery two blocks long, of evicted families, and hungry children we realize that we still have no means for measuring the degree or the extent of unemployment. We do not plan our public work to dovetail into the slack times in private industry. We do not know how to locate industry's stagnant pools and clear waters, and we have no way of shifting men from one to the other. With some 4,000,000 workers unwillingly idle, we ask one another dazedly, "Is unemployment here? How much is there? Where is it? Why?"

THE PRICE OF INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS

"Business," says the December review of the National City Bank, "though no longer proceeding at the boom levels of a year ago, is by no means depressed." Building is continuing at an almost record-breaking rate, bank clearings, even where not affected by stock-market speculation, are running above last year; loadings of merchandise and less-than-carload freight are nearly as high as a year ago. "These," says the bank, "certainly are not symptoms of depression, but, on the contrary, indicate a volume of business distinctly above the average."

Nevertheless, the index of factory employment of the Bureau of Labor Statistics reveals a situation which must be regarded as disquieting. According to the index, factory employment has dropped nearly 15 per cent since 1923 and over 5 per cent since the fall of 1926. (The index of the bureau has a downward bias, but for periods as short as three or four years this bias is almost negligible.) The forces of class 1 railroads in October, 1927, were over 13 per cent below the average for 1923 and over 12 per cent below October, 1926. Since 1923 the population of the country has increased approximately 5 per cent. In addition, business depression and technical progress in agriculture have accentuated the flow of labor from farm to city. From January 1, 1923, to January 1, 1927, the net flow from farm to city was in excess of 3,100,000. Not all of these persons were employment seekers, but it is safe to assume that over 1,000,000 of them were. There has, of course, been a large absorption of labor by garages, filling stations, and building and road construction, and there is a tendency for children to spend more years in school. But even allowing for these things, it is evident that a 15 per cent drop in factory forces and a similar decrease in railroad employment, in conjunction with the 5 per cent increase in population and the large city-ward flow of farm labor, could not occur without producing severe unemployment. In a word, it is evident that there is ample justification for the widespread complaints now current in labor circles concerning the scarcity of jobs. The situation has been slow to attract attention, however, because it has come upon us gradually and stealthily, rather than as a result of a sudden and dramatic collapse of markets. This is shown by comparing the quarterly indexes of factory production and employment beginning with 1926—when the last peak of employment was reached. The figures (1923–1925=100) are as follows:

	Factory output	Factory employment
1926
First quarter	108.3	99.3
Second quarter	107.0	98.0
Third quarter	110.0	96.9
Fourth quarter	103.3	97.6
1927
First quarter	107.3	96.6
Second quarter	109.3	95.7
Third quarter	106.0	93.4
Fourth quarter		92.2

Until the middle of 1927 factory production remained substantially unchanged. Nevertheless, during the entire period there was going on an almost unbroken decrease in employment, a decrease which by the fall of 1927 amounted to 7 per cent.

The present unemployment appears to be due to two principal causes, one cyclical and the other technological. For the last half year, we have been in the trough of the business cycle. This is evidenced by the fact that during the three months ending last November the index of factory production was 9.2 per cent below the corresponding period of 1926. But far more important than the cyclical drop in production has been the steadily increasing efficiency of technique. Taking the period 1923–1925 as 100, manufacturing output in the first 10 months of 1927 was 107, but factory employment was only 95.1. In other words, with 5 per cent fewer employees our factories turned out 7 per cent more product. The figures by industrial groups are significant because they indicate what great increases in output have been accomplished in certain instances with fewer workers.

Production—Employment in October, 1927

All manufacturing industries	102	93
Iron and steel	93	91
Textiles	113	95
Food products	93	97

Most forecasters predict a business revival in the late winter or spring. Their expectation is based upon: (1) The temporary upward trend in wholesale prices; (2) the improvement in the agricultural situation (mail-order sales are running over 45 per cent above the 1923–1925 level); (3) the prospect that money will continue to be cheap; (4) improvements in the European situation as reflected in the recent stabilization of several currencies; and (5) the decrease in manufacturing late in 1927 which has checked the accumulation of inventories. But the revival may not come, and even if it does, it is likely to be mild. Business men tend to avoid commitments in a presidential year; it is extremely uncertain that building will continue on the large scale of the last two years; the necessity of taking definite steps to modify or abandon the Dawes plan will be a disquieting influence in international finance; and finally, the inventory situation is not entirely favorable because stocks of manufactured goods at the end of 1927 stood about 8 per cent above 1926.

But let us grant that a moderate revival of business is probable. Is it likely to relieve unemployment? Here it is important to bear in mind that the present situation is not primarily the product of cyclical causes. Consequently, we should not necessarily expect it to be greatly affected by a moderate business boom. On this point the experience subsequent to the depression in 1924 is instructive. During the six months following the low point in July, 1924, factory output went up 27 per cent, but factory forces increased only 6.2 per cent! In 1925, as a whole, manufacturing output was 12 per cent above 1924, but employment increased by less than 1 per cent. In 1926 factory production advanced 3 per cent above 1925, but again factory forces increased less than 1 per cent. Judging from this experience, a moderate business revival would afford very incomplete relief from the present unemployment situation. Although the employment index might advance to 90, it is unlikely to go much beyond this.

But if a business revival offers little hope of relief, what can and should we do? Clearly, we are confronted with what appears to be a new kind of unemployment problem—the problem of unemployment created by technical progress. This problem has always existed, but its presence has been obscured by the violent cyclical fluctuations of business which have made unemployment appear to be largely a product of the business cycle. Now, however, as business becomes somewhat stabilized, the unemployment caused by technical progress emerges clearly into view. If we succeed in our efforts to control the business cycle, the problem of "technological" unemployment will be with us permanently. We need, therefore, a permanent policy for dealing with it.

The essential question which confronts us is, Why is not the community's demand for goods large enough to create jobs for the men displaced by technical progress? Obviously, if the community had enough dollars to spend for goods, the services of the displaced men would be in demand. The heart of the difficulty seems to be that the community lacks enough dollars to purchase at prevailing prices both the output of the new labor-saving machines and the services of the displaced men. The problem might be solved by forcing down wages or prices until the displaced men could obtain work, but there are obvious objections to a policy that means falling prices or wages. The alternative procedure would be to increase the number of dollars in the possession of the community sufficiently to provide a demand both for the displaced labor and for the output of the new machines.

At the very outset, let it be observed that this can not be done merely by taking dollars away from one part of the community and transferring them to another part. Clear perception of this elemental fact eliminates a number of possible proposals. Fortunately it is not necessary to dig down into the ground for gold in order to provide ourselves with more dollars. The typical dollar to-day is a credit dollar, created by a fountain pen, rather than stamped out of gold bullion by a machine. It lies within the power of the banks to create a large number of credit dollars upon short notice, and the Federal reserve system, by its rediscount and open-market policies, can influence the number of dollars which the banks create. The question therefore arises whether we should not give the Federal reserve system the duty of seeing that the community has enough dollars to provide a demand for the labor displaced by technical progress.

It is obvious that this would be no light responsibility, and possibly we need to know more concerning the detailed functioning of our financial institutions before imposing it upon the Federal reserve system. There are serious dangers to be guarded against. The record of 1927 illustrates one of them. Credit dollars come into existence when customers borrow from the banks. During the last year interest rates have been low and the community has increased its indebtedness to the banks. Nevertheless, the expansion of credit has not diminished unemployment, because the additional dollars have been largely used in stock-market and real-estate speculation where they do not set much labor in motion. Another danger is that the additional dollars would be used to pile up excessive inventories which eventually, of course, would have to be liquidated. This would accentuate the cyclical movement of business. Thus, in our efforts to relieve the unemployment caused by technical progress, we might accentuate the problem of the business cycle. Indeed, it seems quite probable that the Federal reserve system could not discharge the responsibility of providing the community with enough dollars to keep labor employed unless we can give it methods controlling more or less definitely how the dollars are used.

Regardless, however, of the specific procedure which is most desirable, it is evident that we are confronted with an extremely grave problem—the problem of reducing the cost of technical progress. We are obtaining more and better industrial equipment only at the price of a heavy investment in unemployment and human misery. We are not getting a bargain. We are purchasing progress at a high price, and the cost falls largely upon those least able to bear it. The greater our success in stabilizing the business cycle, the more plainly we shall find unemployment created by technical progress staring us in the face. Both justice and expediency demand that the community provide itself with sufficient dollar-purchasing power to give the victims of progress an opportunity to produce.

EDITORIAL ROOMS, THE CINCINNATI POST,
Cincinnati, Ohio, February 17, 1928.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: Your resolution seeking a Federal probe of the unemployment situation will, I think, inspire gratitude among members of the Unemployed Association of Cincinnati.

As a reporter for the Cincinnati Post, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, I have been close to the unemployed men since their organization recently and have learned that one of their chief grievances is against the persons who insist there is nothing but prosperity. In other words, the jobless men object to being ignored—to being compelled to suffer in silence.

The spokesmen for local business organizations, for instance, like to say that there is no abnormal condition of unemployment and that the men and women who are out of work are just chronic idlers. I personally have picked up at random the names of 13 large companies located within a radius of a mile on four streets which have "No help wanted" signs in their windows. A studied search, I am sure, would reveal many others. I know also that the Unemployed Association includes mostly respectable citizens. I have seen pitiful home conditions resulting from unemployment.

The number of unemployed in greater Cincinnati has been estimated as from 15,000 to 70,000. The latter figure probably is exaggerated. But granting a minimum of 15,000, the condition here still appears to be serious. For, computing on a basis of a family unit of three for each of the 15,000, this means that at least 45,000 persons are affected. In a city of 500,000 the problem therefore is great.

The leaders of the jobless men and women have demanded an official investigation of the unemployment situation, believing that the causes are deep rooted in economic conditions. That is why I believe they would welcome Federal action.

They feel that if official attention could be brought to their condition it would go far toward effecting action locally. May I expect a reply on what, if anything, will be done in this regard?

If there is any further information that I am able to furnish, I shall be ready to respond.

Very sincerely yours,

EUGENE SEGAL.

P. S.: I am inclosing several clippings from this paper giving a brief outline of the unemployment situation here.

[Editorial from Journal of Commerce, New York City, Saturday, February 4, 1928]

LABOR-MARKET CONDITIONS

Long before general attention was directed toward the unsatisfactory conditions prevailing in the labor market, economists and statisticians were pointing to the effect of industrial progress in diminishing the opportunities for employment in many lines of business. The number of workers in factories has indeed decreased nearly 15 per cent since 1923, and over 5 per cent since the fall of 1926, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Meanwhile population has been rising and workers have been migrating from farm to city. What has become, meanwhile, of the excess number of workers?

Answers to this question have been provided from time to time and none of them is at all comforting. A recently published discussion of employment trends notes that the index for factory output (1923–1925=100) stood at 106 in the third quarter of 1927, compared with 108.3 at the beginning of 1926. Meanwhile the index for factory employment at the earlier date was 99.3, and only 92.2 in the later period. Recently the depressed conditions in certain important lines of industrial activity and seasonal slackness have raised the percentage of unemployment.

Unfortunately the figures quoted reflect for the most part a long-time trend. This country has upon its hands a problem of chronic unemployment, likely to grow worse rather than better. Business prosperity, far from curing it, may tend to aggravate it by stimulating invention and encouraging all sorts of industrial rationalization schemes.

UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

Governor Smith had a specific purpose in calling upon the State industrial commissioner for a survey of the unemployment situation. The governor wished to determine whether the State of New York, "with its large public-works program," can help to relieve the situation. Commissioner Hamilton's report, though necessarily based on a hasty examination of the facts, does go some way toward furnishing the governor with the required information. The report affirms the existence of serious and increasing unemployment. Conditions weigh most heavily, as usual, upon the unskilled workers, and to the extent that such labor may be utilized on public works a speeding up of the State's program should do good. In the field of skilled labor unemployment is heaviest in the building trades. There, too, it is conceivable that State undertakings might supply work for a considerable number of mechanics and craftsmen. On the other hand, it seems obvious that public works can do little to alleviate factory unemployment, which last December was greater than in December, 1921, and has been increasing.

For emergency purposes it is enough that unemployment prevails and is accompanied by an increase in social distress, as signalized by the family-relief agencies, the general charity organizations, and figures from the New York City Municipal Lodging House. That the great mass of unskilled labor, as recorded by the hotel and domestic service agencies and the figures for department-store and office-work employment, is not available for employment on public works is no reason for neglecting the labor that may be utilized. The moral effect of a direct attack on the unemployment problem is apt to be greater than the direct results. But while Governor Smith is formulating his plans it would be very much in order if the analysis of the situation as a whole could be carried further than it has been in Commissioner Hamilton's report.

[From the New York World, February 20, 1928]

UNEMPLOYMENT

On February 4 Governor Smith requested the industrial commissioner to report upon unemployment in the State, and especially in New York City. With the promptitude which the urgency of the situation demands, Mr. Hamilton's findings are this morning made public. He confirms the general impression that conditions are worse than they have been since 1921. State and private employment agencies report an increased number of applicants for work. The number of nonresidents admitted to the municipal lodging house has risen since last year by 80 per cent. In some lines of work, as in building, there are fewer jobs to divide among the number needing them.

Governor Smith has urged mayors of cities, chairmen of county boards of supervisors, and heads of State departments having to do with construction projects to expedite public works to meet this situation. But all State, city, and county work put together makes a small total in comparison with private undertakings. Capitalists and managing employers can relieve the situation sensibly and hasten permanent relief by pressing forward projects of useful work which can be done more cheaply now than in rush times. John D. Rockefeller, jr., who proposes to rush a million dollars' worth of constructive work about his Tarrytown lands, has a better idea of the matter than "General" Coxey, who would print bales of paper money to loan for public purposes. There is no lack of circulating medium. The money supply per capita is considerably larger than it was in 1914. What is needed is work.

[From the New York Times, February 20, 1928]

CHARTING THE COURSE OF TRADE

Charting the course of trade by voluminous statistics, believed to provide the key both for existing conditions and for future trend, has engaged the attention of business men and economists for decades, but has grown to almost bewildering complexity in recent years. The "indexes of business activity," collected and published every month by the Federal reserve bank, comprise more than 25 separate statistical items, including such once-neglected information as postal receipts, electric power used, real-estate transfers, sales by department stores, mail-order houses and "chain groceries," life insurance taken out, and newspaper advertising. Business men have been known to complain that this multiplicity of "trade barometers," not infrequently contradicting one another, confuses rather than enlightens them regarding the future.

It is possibly with a view to correcting such defects that the industrious Department of Commerce is preparing for what is somewhat vaguely described as "a study of economic currents." This new inquiry, to be conducted under the general auspices of a list of eminent business men, although immediately pursued by the National Bureau of Economic Research, will investigate such questions as changes in standard of living, new methods in production and distribution, variations of prices and profits, shifting of employment—all with a view to their influence on future as well as present and past industrial conditions. Its program also seems to contemplate fresh review of that much-controverted issue, "movements of the economic cycle."

The quest will be interesting. Up to a certain point it should be able to determine the causes underlying phenomena of the day, which are either insoluble mysteries to the man in the street or else are a focus of dispute between wholly antagonistic theories. It could not overlook, for instance, the phenomenon of falling prices for commodities after the spring of 1925, notwithstanding the country's hugely increased supply of gold, and notwithstanding, also, the extremely rapid rise of prices for stocks and real estate. It would have to examine the prevalent theory that the high demand for manufactured products in 1925 and 1926 reflected mainly the high wages paid to workingmen, and it would be compelled to ask how far that theory is compatible with the continuous decrease in the number of men employed by manufacturing industries. One of the questions which it might be expected to take up would be last year's apparent decrease of nearly a million cars in the American people's purchase of automobiles. In regard to this, it is still unsettled whether buying capacity had decreased or whether an army of potential buyers was only awaiting Ford's "new model." The vexed problem of the permanent influence on installment buying on aggregate sales could not be avoided.

Perhaps it may be doubted whether even the most highly qualified body of experts could be brought to agreement on half of these controverted questions. In most of them excellent authority is already aligned on opposite sides. When the investigation reaches the "cycle of prosperity" it will possibly find even greater obstacles. It will be well worth while to learn what is the real drift of expert opinion on these puzzling questions. But that the forces behind the recurrent variations of trade could be so charted as to insure absolute knowledge of the business future from the tendencies of the present would be expecting much. Any such inquiry would still leave open the problem of the consuming public's changing moods and whims; its alternation of lavish expenditure and cautious economy, often seemingly unconnected with any change of individual circumstances, and yet adopted with singular unanimity of action. How wide a field of conjecture is opened up in that direction may be judged by the recent report of the Massachusetts commission on the necessaries of life. Its conclusion was that the average consumer is nowadays so determined to possess what used to be classed as luxuries that "he can no longer be counted on to buy a commodity which has been considered absolutely essential."

[From the National City Bank of New York Monthly Letter, January, 1928]

Taking the year as a whole, decreases in rail traffic have been chiefly in the raw materials moved in bulk, such as coal, while factory employment undoubtedly has been affected by the increased use of labor-saving devices as well as by curtailed schedules in several important lines.

[From the National Industrial Conference Board, New York, Bulletin No. 13, January, 1928]

EMPLOYMENT

Though real earnings and thus the purchasing power of the industrial workers have been maintained at such high levels, the employment situation in manufacturing industries presents some puzzling and problematic features. In the past year employment and average hours worked per wage earner per week in 25 manufacturing industries covered by the conference board's investigations ran at somewhat lower levels, as shown in the chart on page 104, than in 1926. More striking is the fact that during 1927 total employment in these industries averaged about 20 per cent less than at the peak of employment in 1920. The index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that employment in manufacturing industries has been slowly declining during recent years and in 1927 averaged somewhat more than 10 per cent less than in 1923. This is obviously a reflection of increased productive power per worker in manufacturing industries rather than of any falling off in industrial activity itself; but lack of comprehensive data on employment outside of the manufacturing industries covered by the available statistics makes it impossible to say to what extent the labor released from manufacturing industries by improved production methods has found place in collateral or other occupations, and whether, therefore, there has been a tendency toward increasing unemployment and a growing labor reserve in recent years. This problem has so impressed many observers that the Secretary of Labor has recently said that the United States will need labor-making devices as much as labor-saving devices in the future if unemployment is to be avoided and the purchasing power of the working population is to be maintained.

[From the Monthly Review—Federal Reserve Bank of New York, February 1, 1928]

EMPLOYMENT AND WAGES

Factory employment declined further in December; the decrease was nearly 2 per cent in New York State and about 1 per cent in the country as a whole, and this bank's index, which is adjusted for the usual seasonal variations, reached the lowest point since the spring of 1922. It is estimated that more than 20,000 workers in New York State and about 70,000 in the entire country were laid off during the month. There appears to have been recently a substantial amount of unemployment among unskilled laborers, who usually find employment at this time of the year in removing snow in cities, following the termination of seasonal work on farms and road construction. There is also some unemployment in the building trades. This unemployment is reflected in the ratio of orders for workers to applications for employment at New York State employment offices, which declined to a new low level in December and showed a further decline in the first three weeks of January.

Total factory pay rolls in New York State were higher in December, however, and average weekly earnings per employee showed a rather substantial increase, advancing to a level above that of a year ago and close to the high record of last March. It is likely that the increased pay rolls were largely accounted for by increased working time, but the higher per capita earnings may be due partly to the release of lower paid workers.

According to a semiannual calculation made by this bank from reports of about 20 large and varied employers of unskilled workers, the average hourly hiring rate for unskilled labor was the same on the 1st of January as on the 1st of last July; but because of the longer hours during the winter, the average weekly rate was slightly higher.

The reports indicated very low rates of labor turnover and a surplus of nearly all classes of labor, although a scarcity of railway trackmen and some types of skilled mechanics was noted in a few instances.

FUNDS FOR RELIEF DECLARED URGENT

Facing the largest volume of family relief calls during the past month in its entire history, the board managers of the Associated Charities, at their regular meeting yesterday afternoon in the Social Service House, approved the plans of the joint finance committee, representing also the Citizens' Relief Association, for making a more vigorous campaign during the coming Easter season. The board fixed the two weeks beginning on March 26 and extending to Easter Sunday as the period for this city-wide appeal.

Reports of the relief work carried on during January by the visitors of the Associated Charities disclosed a total of $6,622.23 disbursed for rent, fuel, food, clothing, and other necessities for families, as compared with a total of $5,663.23 during January, 1927. There were 568 families receiving care from this society last month, as compared with 474 families the same month of last year.

Unemployment was found to be an increasing factor of dependence during this period, as this affected 224 families, as against 164 a year ago. This indicates that Washington is experiencing a similar problem of unemployment to that reported by social agencies in many other cities.

JOBS ARE FEWER, DAVIS CONCEDES—BUT LABOR SECRETARY THINKS FIGURES ON UNEMPLOYMENT ARE TOO BIG—42,000,000 WORK, HE SAYS—LONDON PRESS FEATURES SITUATION, PREDICTING A CRASH

WASHINGTON, February 16.—With a statement that unemployment has increased lately in the United States, Secretary of Labor Davis in an address to-night urged members of an association of marine engineers to resist wage or tariff reductions, which he said might aggravate conditions.

"We have unemployment in the country," the Secretary said. "Everyone knows it. Why not admit it? As to the total number of people now unemployed, a number of estimates are going the rounds. My own guess is that these are somewhat exaggerated.

"The Department of Labor is now gathering figures to show what the present unemployment total actually is. As soon as these figures are ready the public shall have them.

"In the meantime let us remember that 42,000,000 Americans are gainfully employed."

LONDON PRESS SEES UNEMPLOYMENT AS OMINOUS SIGN

LONDON, February 16.—In the last few days London newspapers have been regaling their readers with accounts of American unemployment affecting, some articles say, 5,000,000 workers in the United States.

The New York correspondent of the Daily News hints American newspapers are concealing an approaching trade disaster. The Daily Herald, organ of the Labor Party, will comment editorially to-morrow:

"The gilt begins to peel from this much-advertised gingerbread. In America, as elsewhere, the boom is collapsing. A disastrous slump is succeeding it. The artificial stimulus of enormous gold accumulations has spent its force. Not all the devices of Babbitry can maintain the pretence of prosperity.

"Everywhere wages are being cut. The great riches of a few capitalists, propagandists have assured us, have brought prosperity for the masses. That myth is collapsing. The workers of the United States are suffering as their fellow-workers in Europe. In the richest cities in the richest country in the world hungry men are standing for hours in freezing weather waiting for a cup of coffee and a hunk of bread."

GIVE DATA ON LABOR SURVEYS—ORGANIZATIONS LIST GROUPS WHICH ARE CHIEF SUFFERERS NOW

Widespread laying off of the least-fit workers has resulted in one of the most distressing factors in the present unemployment situation, according to reports by a number of organizations yesterday. The unfortunates most badly affected include those with physical disabilities, those who must combat racial prejudices, and those with least special training.

A bulletin of the National Urban League gives instances and statistics from all sections of the country showing that negro workers are being laid off in favor of white workers. The result has been to throw far more than their proportionate share of suffering upon negro groups, and the creation of a drifting population which circulates around the cities of a particular section, producing a particularly difficult social problem.

Clerical or white-collar workers, particularly among girls, have been hard hit, according to Mrs. Helen W. Eldredge of the central branch Y. W. C. A. employment bureau, because of the rapid introduction of office machinery during the last few years. The result of this, coupled with the present unemployment situation, has been to reduce the number of employees required and increase the requirements of skill on the part of each individual.

Robert W. DeForest, president of the Charity Organization Society, reported that that organization was finding the worst conditions among workers with slight physical handicaps and those who were no longer young. These classes, he said, have little chance of getting a job when competition with the able-bodied is so keen.

UNEMPLOYMENT HIGH IN CHICAGO DISTRICT—STEEL INDUSTRY ACTIVE AND DRY-GOODS TRADE HOLDS UP WELL

(Special to the New York Times)

CHICAGO, February 19.—Business conditions in the Chicago territory show little change, and while somewhat spotted this is due in part to recent abnormal weather conditions.

Steel is active with about 93 per cent of the capacity of local mills in operation, the highest percentage so far. About 50,000 tons of structural material were let during the week, including 19,000 tons for the new civic opera building, work on which will start shortly.

Official reports show that unemployment is larger now than at this season in over six years, the increase during January being 2.6 per cent. The month of February, however, usually shows an increase in the number of men on pay rolls, and with building operations promising to start earlier than usual it is expected that the next report will be considerably more optimistic.

Wholesale dry-goods business was about in line with last year, while mail-order houses continue to report orders in excess of 1927, with the advance in grain prices of late having some effect on purchases by farmers.

The automobile business is fairly active, with no new change in prices. The slackening in employment is reflected in a slow turnover of used cars.

LABOR SLUMP IN ILLINOIS

CHICAGO, February 17 (Special).—Employment in Illinois is down to a lower level than at any time since the 1921 slump. There was a further drop of 2.1 per cent in January in the number of workers, but improvement is expected this month.

JOBLESS RETURN TO BREAD LINE—200 CARED FOR AT CITY MISSION AT 1314 VINE STREET—RELIGIOUS SERVICE IS HELD—EIGHT MEN KNEEL IN TEARS AT ALTAR HERE

A bread line for jobless men will be resumed Monday at City Mission, 1314 Vine Street, headquarters of the newly organized Cincinnati Unemployed Association.

The line was started Sunday night following services attended by the unemployed.

A. F. Kinney, head of the mission and chairman of the committee of eighteen of the Unemployed Association, told members of the congregation who were hungry to form a line. All present, about 200 in all, including women and children, responded. They were served coffee and sandwiches. After they had finished they responded to a second call.

WEEPS AT ALTAR

McKinney then announced that persons needing spiritual comfort could come forward. Eight men kneeled weeping at the foot of the altar while McKinney whispered a prayer for help.

The food served was contributed by food-show sponsors and bought with other contributions.

McKinney asks the public for donations of food with which to feed needy jobless men and their families until their condition can be relieved permanently.

R. P. Farrell, secretary of the Unemployed Association, and Charles Cook, of the committee of eighteen, toured the city until a late hour Saturday night, bringing food to 23 families who were in immediate need.

WOMAN BUYS FOOD

The food was purchased with money donated by a woman member of the committee who is serving as a representative from the Woman's City Club.

The committee issued a public statement thanking C. O. Sherrill, city manager, for his proposal to relieve unemployment by rushing city improvements.

William Marqua, member of the committee, replied Monday to some of a group representing the city, organized labor, relief agencies, and the chamber of commerce, who intimated Saturday that the figures on jobless had been exaggerated and that unnecessary agitation was being carried on.

"The State-City Free Employment Bureau admits 15,000 are out of work," Marqua says. "We may reduce this to 10,000 and the problem still is serious, because with each of the 10,000 representing a family unit of three, 30,000 persons are affected.

BY ORDERLY PROCEDURE

"We are not trying to inflame the members of our organization. We emphasize that only by orderly procedure can we accomplish anything."

Unemployed men and women were being registered Monday at headquarters, 1314 Vine Street, to determine the exact number in Cincinnati. Thus far about 2,000 have been listed.

Brotherhood Welfare Hall, at 410 Clinton Street, is being used by the association as sleeping quarters for jobless men. Seventy-four men, said to have been evicted from their homes, slept on the floor of the hall Sunday night and were given breakfast Monday morning.

McKinney said he finds few drifting workers among those who apply for relief. Records, he says, show they are resident Cincinnatians, many of whom never before have been forced to seek charity. Some bring their families into the mission to get food.

DISARMAMENT BY EXAMPLE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, last Friday there appeared in the press a statement to the effect that the representatives of the United States Government at the Habana conference had recommended that the American nations agree to the outlawing of all aggressive warfare. The next day there appeared in the Brisbane editorial this little item:

American nations at Habana agree to "outlaw aggressive war on these American continents." What is aggressive war is the other nation's "war," of course. No modern nation ever fought without calling it "self-defense."

I think Mr. Brisbane is entirely correct in his statement about aggressive warfare.

I hold in my hand an article by Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, a member of the British Parliament, entitled "Disarmament by example." I want to read just one sentence from it. Speaking of aggressive warfare, Mr. Ponsonby said:

No nation has ever admitted being an aggressor. No nation could get its people to support a war which was declared openly to be a war of aggression.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD this article by Arthur Ponsonby, M. P., from the Contemporary Review of December, 1927, which is as follows:

DISARMAMENT BY EXAMPLE

There is some advantage in attempting to do something in the wrong way. It narrows down the choice of wrong roads and brings the selection of the right road a little nearer. The advantage is all the greater when several wrong attempts are made. Nevertheless this process of the gradual elimination of the wrong roads is likely to be protracted and so to produce impatience.

In varying degrees the statesmen of Europe may all be given the credit of not wanting a recurrence of war in the form they experienced it in 1914–1918 or, as we know it will be, infinitely worse. They all want security for their countries, but none of them believe that security can be obtained without armed force. The coordination of a warless world with national security is the problem they find impossible to solve. Their first attempt in 1919, hot from the conflict, was for the victors to disarm the vanquished. This was the first wrong road. Unilateral disarmament imposed by force neither makes for peace nor is it a first step toward general disarmament. The controversies between France and Germany in the years after the war were of the acutest possible character, and during nearly 10 years the victors have never suggested carrying out the terms of the peace treaty by reducing their armaments to the standard imposed on Germany—a very simple proposition easy of execution and leading much further than any of the suggestions which have been discussed in the last seven or eight years.

In 1922 a scheme was brought forward for the reduction of armaments by each nation down to a fixed general standard. But without any specific guarantee of security this was considered impracticable. In 1923 the treaty of mutual assistance was evolved which projected the conclusion of treaties of defense against aggression. No satisfactory definition of aggression was forthcoming, and although the Fourth Assembly of the League of Nations supported this proposal it fell to the ground, being rejected by Great Britain.

In 1924 the protocol was produced. In this the principle of arbitration was emphasized and proposals for disarmament were to be the preliminary to a general guarantee of security against aggression. Aggression was defined as resorting to war after a refusal to submit a dispute to the Council of the League. This was an advance. But while confining, it more precisely defined the obligations under the covenant and still necessitated the retention of armaments for the possible eventuality of a breach of the peace by a recalcitrant nation. The British Conservative Government regarded the commitments as too extensive and the protocol was turned down before the end of the year.

The Locarno pact which followed two years later was a partial and regional treaty by which Great Britain guaranteed the Franco-German frontier against aggression from either side. Although restricted, this was a very serious commitment on our part. The rather artificially engineered enthusiasm with which the conclusion of this treaty was accompanied has since proved not to have been justified. There has been little or no improvement in the relations between heavily armed France and disarmed Germany.

While the politicians were thus occupied a conference dominated by experts was charged with the task of formulating disarmament proposals. No more unsuitable body of men could have been chosen. No worse method of procedure could have been devised. Instead of providing them with principles within which to work, the very formulation of the principles was left to men who not only believe in force but whose business it is to see that the composition of that force is adequate and effective. The barren results of the preparatory commission on disarmament need not be recited here. In spite of the well-meaning resolution of the last assembly urging the commission to get on with their job, nothing can be expected from this method of approach.

In 1922 the Washington conference succeeded in securing a certain measure of reduction in naval armaments, but the recent conference at Geneva, in which only three powers participated, has shown by its failures not only that no further advance is likely to be attained in this direction but that it is beyond the power of experts to discover binding principles of universal application for nations whose geographical position and general circumstances vary so widely.

Outside the official sphere the most significant movement toward the abolition of war has emanated from America. Proposals for the outlawry of war set out convincingly by Dr. C. C. Morrison, in a book recently published, are based on the simple proposition that the nations by common consent should place the waging of war outside international law. Considerable impetus to this movement has been given by a suggestion of M. Briand that war should be outlawed between France and the United States. Although sectional treaties for the outlawry of war would be a slower method of procedure and make a more precarious advance toward the ideal than a universally accepted resolution by a world conference, as is proposed, nevertheless outlawry has been brought into official prominence, and more is likely to be heard of it.

But so far as the League of Nations and the governments are concerned, the failure in the course of nine years not only to formulate any definite project for the abolition of war but to give any hope that such a project is attainable, has been in the highest degree disappointing. The attempts made have many of them done more harm than good. While the futile academic discussions have proceeded the governments have drifted back into the old diplomacy, defensive alliances have been formed, camps have been established, and the old pernicious doctrine of the balance of power has been kept in being. The most significant demonstration of the hopelessness of any prospect of official advance toward disarmament has been afforded by the resignation of Lord Cecil, a devoted supporter of the league and untiring advocate of peace. Moreover while these various avenues have been explored with little or no success armaments continue to be manufactured in considerable quantities and at great cost, the traffic in arms continues in order that the less developed and, so called, more bellicose states may be fully equipped and then pointed to as potential enemies or breakers of the peace, and the ingenuity of science has been enlisted for the further development of more deadly engines of destruction.

The truth is that the inherent belief of the leading governments in force as the ultimate sanction remains unaltered. So long as it remains armaments must continue to be prepared, and so long as armaments remain there must be competition, prospects of war, and absence of security. Thus it is that the nations find themselves revolving in a vicious circle, out of which there seems to be no escape.

It has been proposed that a nation, preferably ourselves, should come forward and make a bold and specific offer of a measure of disarmament, suggesting that if others will do likewise a general reduction can begin. But the fatal "if" stands in the way of such a proposal ever being regarded as a genuine offer. While the governments are thus hesitant, the same can not be said of the peoples. Disillusioned and far more determined than their governments that war is not only an inhuman, but an utterly futile method of attempting to settle international disputes, they are becoming exasperated at the failure of their statesmen to find means of abolishing this barbarous institution. In several countries thousands have pledged themselves to refuse participation in another orgy of massacre. This may not stop war, but it will undoubtedly have the effect of preventing governments from using the threat of the war card in their diplomatic negotiations. No government would care to take the risk of going to war with any considerable section of their people determinedly opposed to rendering any help or support in such a contingency.

What then can governments, what can the Government of Great Britain, be urged to do to lead world opinion and to give practical expression to what, after all, is the dominant sentiment of the people of the world, although the majority of them may be largely inarticulate?

Before elaborating the proposal through which alone, one is compelled to believe, success may be achieved, it is necessary to clear the ground of certain myths and delusions which have grown up round the institution of war. The nature and origin of wars have changed as the centuries pass, and it is idle, therefore, to quote precedents from the past and to dwell on the glories of past military achievements, which are misleadingly represented to us in our history books. It suffices for us to take war as it is to-day and as it may arise to-morrow. In nearly all the discussion on the subject carried on by the governments and the League of Nations the probable cause of war is misrepresented, and an elaborate mechanism is devised for an eventuality which will never take place. The existence of the League of Nations has made the statesmen believe that war will arise from an isolated and definable act of aggression. Wars in the past hundred years and more between European States have never arisen in this way. But the myth of the unprovoked aggressor has been kept alive by (a) the accusation of aggression which each nation has to bring against its enemy while war is being waged, and (b) the necessity of postulating an aggressor in peace time in order to make each nation prepare for the next war. Wars arise, and if the institution is maintained will arise in future, not from the breach of a treaty, the isolated refusal of a nation to submit a dispute to arbitration, the crossing of a frontier, or the capture of territory, but from a complex network of tendencies producing estrangement between nations and finding expression in the formation of groups and alliances. When the tension reaches a certain pitch, any act, however trivial, may become not the cause but the occasion of war. The whole concept of an aggressor, like the notion of "a criminal nation," must be dismissed if we are to clear the air of hampering misconceptions.

Another delusion is retained in the idea that you can abolish "private war" by organizing in a restricted degree "public war" under the guise of a collective guaranty of security for all nations. In this rests the whole fallacy of sanctions. It does not seem to have occurred to anyone that the idea of stopping war by war is farcical in the extreme. So long as governments agree that circumstances may arise in which the collective use of force is not only permissible, but essential, attention, and serious attention, must be given to the organization of war, armaments must be retained, and not only public but private war will continue to exist. The obligatory provision in any conceivable circumstance of armed assistance queers the whole pitch. The organization of war, in however restricted a sense it may be defined, must inevitably prevent the inauguration of peace.

Lastly let us dispose of another specious fallacy which has arisen out of all the discussions on disarmament.

It is that war can only be abolished by stages and by degrees. No more fatally mistaken idea could have possessed men's minds. Every effort by standards, ratios, expenditure, or parity to reduce armaments, and every plan to restrict the occasions on which force may be used, only serves to give legal and authoritative sanction to the use of force and the institution of war. Such steps and stages are definitely inimical to the attainment of the abolition of war. The construction of an institution can not be accomplished in one blow, the destruction of an institution can. The abolitionists of slavery as an institution in British territory soon found that to proceed by steps and stages was fatal to the attainment of their object. When they determined to leave no loophole and allow no qualifications, they succeeded.

The abolitionist must be convinced; he must follow the course which reason and expediency, not to mention morality and civilization, demand; he must not wait for or depend on the consent of others in order to take the step. Face-saving phrases inserted into declarations with a view to securing unanimity can be dropped. This means disarmament by example. Let us see how this would work out and let us meet the objections brought against an idea which appears to some who do not look beneath the surface purely quixotic idealism. It is difficult to foresee the reactions in other nations because we are presupposing an outlook and steadfastness of purpose on the part of the initiator of which there is no faint reflection in the mood of any of the present governments, and which by its implications will come as a call to the world of a very sensational character.

The government which has the courage to announce its repudiation of war as a method of settling international disputes in any circumstances whatever will make its announcement before the League of Nations, and declare its intention to turn its back on war and cast aside forever the war weapon. Those who oppose such a declaration being made base their opposition on the indispensable necessity of self-defense against an aggressor. As already shown, the aggressor is a war myth. But let us carry the matter a step further for the benefit of those who believe in him. No nation has ever admitted being an aggressor. No nation could get its people to support a war which was declared openly to be a war of aggression. An attack leveled against a nation which had repudiated the idea of ever resorting to force, and which, therefore, could not be suspected in the remotest degree of provocation, would ipso facto be a war of aggression and the nation who undertook it would be a self-confessed aggressor before the world. No nation, no government, no statesman would be a party to any such move. The fear, therefore, of a disarming or unarmed nation being attacked is chimerical and need not be taken into account.

The economic dislocation caused by the inauguration of complete disarmament (except for a police force) would be a matter which the Government in question would have to take into account, and for which careful provision would have to be made. So also the closing down of armament works and the prohibition of traffic in arms would have to come under Government control. Such plans of organization and readjustment would be nothing like as difficult or as extensive as the colossal task of mobilizing a whole nation for the waging of war. It would be a magnificent and inspiring effort for the real establishment of peace. To say that such an initiative taken by a government would not be met by an immediate response from other nations is to underestimate the detestation of war that exists among the peoples and the eagerness of many governments to make a bolder and more sincere step toward the ideal than any which has yet been forthcoming.

Neither danger nor difficulties of practical execution are the real obstacle. The existence of the former can be disproved, the latter are matters of carefully thought-out organization. But the dead weight of the influence of the services will be brought to bear against the inauguration of such a scheme and, indeed, against any advance which would be likely to relegate war to the category of an abandoned barbarity. The paramount influence of the members of the services, both in the political and social sphere, will operate, indeed does already operate, against the permanent establishment of peace. Formidable as this obstacle is with its undefined and yet far-reaching ramifications, it can be fought by a democracy which is fully informed and adequately represented. Disarmament must be treated as the preliminary to, not the consequence of, security. The only way to overcome the obstacles which seem to lurk in any disarmament conferences where unanimity is sought is by a bold but reasoned initiative. Arbitration will become a reality and court and council can function without the fatal misgiving that their efforts may lead to an authorized exercise of force.

Great Britain desires no more territory, and even veiled aggression to secure a further extension of empire is not contemplated by any single person. Great Britain has learned that no desirable object is achieved by war, and the people of Great Britain decline to believe that by the diabolical barbarity of modern warfare their prestige can be enhanced or their beneficent intentions extended. They are jealous of no nation and they suspect no nation of evil intentions against them. They are a genuinely peace-loving people, and no people is more anxious to devote its energy, its enterprise, and its wealth to mastering the crying social evils and economic injustices which at present hamper the development of its moral, cultural, and spiritual capacities. The people of Great Britain are prepared to give credit to other peoples for similar sentiments. They are exasperated at the interval of peace being used, as it always has been, to sort out gradually a possible enemy and by pointing to the danger of conflict create it.

Disarmament by example has the same effect as the scheme for the outlawry of war. The nation making the declaration thereby repudiates the legality of war. It does not contemplate any need for self-defense which implies belief in an aggressor. Moreover, it has the further advantage of being a practical step within the power of one government and easily understood, and not a scheme which has to await the consent of all the nations. It will force an amendment for the removal of sanctions from the covenant or from the protocol, and it makes disarmament a reality and no longer a hopeless bone of contention for the experts.

Disarmament by example breaks the vicious circle, disposes of the fatal "ifs" and "whens," and implies a trust in other nations which will be justified because of the effect on the nations of the world which a government speaking with this voice is bound to have.

Disarmament by example cuts away at one stroke the steps and stages which are at present leading the nations into a blind alley.

Disarmament by example removes the dilemma with which a government bent on the establishment of peace is confronted when by every other hitherto proposed scheme it is obliged to keep armaments in being, improve them so that they may not be out of date, and listen to experts as to their adequacy.

Credit must be given to the League of Nations for keeping to the front this vital question by continuous and repeated discussion of it. Nations are apt to be distracted by their own internal problems and to ignore this overmastering issue of peace and war which governs not only international but national policy. Little, however, can be expected from the international debates on their present lines. When a government has the courage to proceed by way of example instead of precept the whole scene will change and the seemingly unattainable will come within the reach of man.

ARTHUR PONSONBY.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SMOOT. I submit a conference report and move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9136) "making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 23, 27, 28, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 39, and 52.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 37, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, and 50; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "; second, to reimbursing the United States for the cost of the San Carlos irrigation project; third, to payment of operation and maintenance charges and the making of repairs and improvements on said project: Provided further, That reimbursements to the United States from power revenues shall not reduce the annual payments from landowners on account of the principal sum constituting the cost of construction of the power plant or the project works until such sum shall have been paid in full: Provided further, That the Federal Power Commission is hereby directed, within 60 days after the approval of this act, to report to Congress what compensation, if any, in addition to that already provided for, should be paid to the Apache Indians of the San Carlos Reservation by reason of the generation of hydroelectric power at the Coolidge Dam, in the manner provided in section 10 (e) of the Federal water power act and section 5 of regulation 14 of the Federal Power Commission"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out, and on page 35 of the bill, in lines 2 and 3, strike out the following: "not exceeding five years"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "Claremore Hospital, Okla., $50,000, on condition that the city of Claremore donate to the United States not less than 5 acres of land for such hospital and agree to deliver without charge medicinal water; in all, $155,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$165,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum of $330,000 proposed in such amendment, insert "$305,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 32: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 from the power revenues shall be available during the fiscal year 1929 for the operation of the commercial system; in all, $1,104,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: ": Provided further, That not to exceed $20,000 from the power revenues shall be available during the fiscal year 1929 for the operation and maintenance of the commercial system"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$12,644,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on amendments numbered 6, 12, 46, and 51.

REED SMOOT,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
FRANK MURPHY,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] objects to one of the amendments on which there is agreement, the one relative to the Flathead irrigation project. He desires to speak upon the subject now, as does also the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Therefore I wanted simply to state that the amendment was agreed to by the conferees, with a slight amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report is not debatable. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Utah to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

MERGER OF DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY SYSTEMS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, ever since I have been in Washington there have been attempts made from time to time to bring about a consolidation of the two street-car systems of this city, a condition very desirable, much to be hoped and wished for.

Recently the papers have announced that an agreement has been reached by which a consolidation would take place. An examination of the proposition of the two companies to consolidate will, I think, be startling to every citizen who has any interest it in and who desires that when such consolidation takes place it shall be on a fair capitalization basis. The proposition which will probably soon be presented to the Congress for its approval will, in my judgment, be one that will shock the conscience of all those who do not want to see an advantage taken of the desirability of a consolidation by putting into the consolidation a whole lot of useless capitalization and a whole lot of water.

I have here, and desire to read an editorial on the subject written by Mr. Judson C. Welliver. It seems to me it calls attention to the situation in such a way that it ought to attract the attention of all those who want to bring about the consolidation on a fair and honest capitalization basis.

The editorial reads as follows:

Senator HOWELL, of Nebraska, made some remarks in the Senate February 15, which might well be read by every street-car rider and every electricity user in Washington. They are highly illuminative of vital matters involved in the pending mergers of traction and electric interests in this town.

For it is now apparent that two gigantic mergers, instead of one, are proposed by Harley P. Wilson and his associates. If the plan goes through the Washington Transit Co. will control transportation, whether by street cars or by busses.

The Potomac Electric Power Co. will take over the electric plants of Capital Traction, and, holding these together with its present plants, will completely dominate the power situation.

It would, indeed, have one of the finest public-utility monopolies in the country, for its market would include both the traction system and the private users of electricity.

HIGH TOLL INEVITABLE SO LONG AS MIDDLE LINK EXISTS

These considerations give particular point to Senator HOWELL'S remarks on the cost of electricity in different cities, and under differing conditions. He wants the United States, which is already operating the Muscle Shoals plant but selling the current for distribution by private companies, to build its own transmission lines.

He says that so long as private distributing companies are allowed to interpose themselves between producer and consumer, they will take an unconscionably high toll for their services.

The Province of Ontario, Canada, is in this regard the model to which Senator HOWELL points. Ontario gets power from the Canadian side of Niagara Falls. Publicly owned plants there produce the current, and the publicly owned distributing system distributes it.

On the American side of Niagara Falls, privately owned plants produce the current, and privately owned distribution systems distribute it. How do the results compare?

Senator HOWELL finds that in 1926 the average bill for electricity in Niagara Falls, Canada, was for 208 kilowatt-hours per month. The charge therefor was $2.54. In Niagara Falls, N. Y., just across the river, the consumer paid for the same 208 kilowatt-hours $7.40.

That is, the Canadian consumer paid just about one-third as much as the American.

Both sides drew their power from the same Niagara Falls. So striking a difference compels conclusion that the difference between public and private operation is responsible.

Extending similar comparisons to places more distant from the energy-producing plants, Senator HOWELL finds that Birmingham, Ala., is furnished hydroelectric power by the Alabama Power Co. Toronto gets its power from Niagara Falls, about 100 miles away; Birmingham, from Muscle Shoals, also about 100 miles away. The Birmingham Distributing Co. buys its current at Muscle Shoals from the United States Government for 2 mills per kilowatt-hour. The Toronto distributing establishment pays 2.8 mills per kilowatt-hour, at Niagara Falls.

BIRMINGHAM PAYS $7 FOR SAME THING FOR WHICH TORONTO GIVESS $1.62

In 1926 the average bill for domestic consumption in Toronto was for 94 kilowatt-hours per month, for which the consumer paid $1.62.

But in Birmingham, Ala., the domestic consumer of 94 kilowatt-hours a month paid $7.

There you have it; $7 in Birmingham, $1.62 in Toronto. In each case the electricity is produced from water power at a Government plant. In each case it is transmitted just about 100 miles; the only difference is that at Toronto the distribution is by a publicly owned establishment; at Birmingham, by one privately owned. But the Birmingham consumer pays six times as much as the Toronto consumer.

Would the people of Washington prefer to be in the position of Birmingham or in that of Toronto? It is possible for them to be in a better position than either. For Washington has right at its door the great power potentiality of Great Falls. No other American city of the first importance has such a privilege of equipping itself with the cheapest power. That is what Washington ought to have, and is entitled to: The cheapest power in any first-class American city.

If it be asked, What does this have to do with a street-car merger in Washington? The answer is obvious. Right parallel with the street-car merger, we are to get a merger of the electric facilities of the town. For it is proposed that when the street-car systems are consolidated, the new company will turn over the power plants now owned by the Capital Traction Co., to the Potomac Electric Power Co., thus giving it for the first time a complete monopoly. Then, Pepco will sell all the electricity that all the street cars in town use, and all the electricity that everybody else uses.

Why has there been, over 20 years or more, such persistent and determined opposition to developing and using the Great Falls power? Everybody knows the answer. It is the Potomac Electric Power Co.

On a former occasion, Mr. President, in this Chamber I said there were three reasons why Great Falls had never been developed: The first one was the Potomac Electric Power Co., the second one was the Potomac Electric Power Co., and the third one was the Potomac Electric Power Co.

The editorial continues:

If that company is given the complete monopoly of power which the merger proposes, it will have more reason than ever to exercise all of its possible influence to protect that particular good thing. Its zeal to preserve the scenic beauties that nobody in particular ever goes to see, will be instantly redoubled. It will be in position most liberally to endow all the nature lovers who will enlist under its banner.

Mr. President, let me digress here to say that there is now pending in the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate a bill the object of which is to preserve the so-called scenic beauty of the Potomac River. I remember some time ago there was considerable agitation about the alleged destruction of scenic beauty which would ensue if a bill that I had introduced should become a law. That bill, which, by the way, passed the Senate on three separate occasions, provided for the development by the Government of the United States of the power at Great Falls, almost within sight of the dome of this Capitol, power that would turn every wheel and light every home in the District of Columbia, with an abundance to spare; power that would save, if developed, more than 250,000 tons of coal every year in the production of electricity. While that bill was pending some one was offering the objection that now is being offered to the Government's development of Great Falls; the objection that "it would destroy the beauties of nature on the Potomac River." We went out there to see what "the beauties of nature" were. We had some difficulty in getting up and down on different sides of the river, and it was queer that in our entire trip, consuming nearly a day, we found only one person enjoying those beauties. So it will be found that just as soon as the "nature lovers" are able to defeat the development of that power by the Government of the United States, the "nature lovers" will disappear from the scene, and later on, as this editorial shows, the power companies will come, and with them will come the opportunity for monopoly that the proposed merger now before the people of the District of Columbia presents.

I might as well say here, Mr. President, that nothing would so enhance the beauty of the river in the vicinity of Washington as the carrying out of the plan of development outlined in the public document of which General Tyler is the author. The plan there proposed provides for the building of a dam near the District line and another dam above Great Falls, and a couple of storage dams. Thus there would be created just on the edge of the District a lake that would be, as I remember—and I am speaking only from memory—about 9 miles in length and several miles wide that would produce an immense amount of power; but upon the bosom of that lake the people of this city and of this country who come here to visit the Capital of the Nation, would be able to enjoy themselves in a way that is now absolutely impossible. Recreation would be afforded on that lake for thousands and thousands of people in a way that is now impossible. So, instead of destroying the beauties of nature, the plan if carried out would add to them. If we shall ever make the proper development at Great Falls we will add to the beauties and attractions there in such a way as to bring enjoyment and happiness to millions of visitors who come to visit this city from all over the world if they should care to go out and avail themselves of the advantages there offered.

Let me continue with this editorial:

HERE IS A GUESS; THE REAL PRIZE WILL BE FOUND IN A POWER MONOPOLY

This newspaper ventures to guess that the real capital prize in this whole merger business will ultimately be found to be this power monopoly. Let us look at this aspect for a moment:

The North American Co. of New York, of which Mr. Wilson is a director, owns, according to Mr. Wilson's statement, 75 per cent of the common stock of Washington Railway & Electric. Mr. Wilson adds that it does not own any of the preferred stock. Its 75 per cent of common stock is about one-third of the total voting stock.

As everybody knows, that is a practical, working control. The holder of so large a minority can always be confident of enlisting the support of enough more to control stockholders' meetings.

For practical purposes, then, Mr. Wilson's North American Co. controls Washington Railway & Electric Co. And Washington Railway & Electric Co. owns the voting stock of Pepco. Now, we are getting down to what Senator La Follette somewhat inelegantly used to refer to as the viscera of this proposition. When the thing is all over, the North American Co. will hold in one hand the entire traction facilities of the town; and in the other hand the entire power facilities. Thus will be established a lovely working harmony; thus will be powerfully maintained the high moral purpose of protecting the scenic beauties of the Great Falls region.

SUPPOSE THEY CHANGE THEIR MINDS; WHAT WILL NATURE LOVERS DO THEN?

But wait. Perhaps even the nature lovers will do well to look a little farther. The basic interest of the North American Co. is electric power. It is one of the small group of great hydroelectric concerns that, taken together, are commonly referred to as the Electric Power Trust. Of course, they are not a trust at all. They say they are not, and their word may be accepted. But it will not have escaped attention that when they pool their interests and influence in any common cause—such as emasculating the Walsh resolution—they manage to get what they want.

If, then, this double-barreled merger goes through, we shall have the North American Co. in control of a traction monopoly and a power monopoly in Washington. What would, naturally and inevitably, be the next ambition of this so comfortably intrenched double-breasted monopoly? Having use for so much power to run its street cars, and having in addition the whole market of Washington and vicinity for power, and being primarily in the electric-power business, anyhow—would the North American Co. long be content to leave Great Falls as a "premier beauty spot"? We opine not.

The next move, unless Mr. Wilson and the North American Co. are vastly less astute than they have shown themselves thus far, would be to get the privilege of developing the Great Falls power. That would put the finishing touch on the system; the capstone on a monumental monopoly of municipal facilities in this town.

Again, do the people of Washington prefer to be in the position of Birmingham or in that of Toronto?

I think, Mr. President, that Mr. Welliver might well have added that this fear that he has shown that they would be after Great Falls next is in fact a reality, because for many years a subsidiary of the Potomac Electric Power Co. has owned and now claims the ownership of a great many rights in connection with Great Falls—overflow rights and riparian rights. For years they have owned them in the name of a corporation the name of which I have forgotten just now, but which has no income whatever; and the only object of its existence, as far as I can see, is to enable this power monopoly to have a strangle hold and the inside track in case it is ever attempted by anybody to develop the power at Great Falls.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator as to the present status of his bill for the development of Great Falls?

Mr. NORRIS. My bill is in the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FLETCHER. That bill has passed the Senate three times?

Mr. NORRIS. Three different times; yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. But it never got very far in the House?

Mr. NORRIS. It never received favorable consideration at the hands of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. The same bill is now in the District Committee?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. And they also have the bill with reference to conserving the scenic beauty of Great Falls?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I am not particular which one they report.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the Senator would like to get a report on one?

Mr. NORRIS. On one or the other of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator will press that bill. If the Senator's bill becomes a law I think it will probably solve this whole problem.

EIGHTH INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that the conference report on the appropriation bill is before the Senate. I desire to ask if those in charge of the bill will permit a little morning business to be transacted?

Mr. SMOOT. If it is not going to take any time.

Mr. BORAH. The matter I have in mind will not lead to any discussion, but I want to have it disposed of.

I have here a joint resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June and July, 1928, and authorizing an appropriation of $10,000 to pay the expenses of the delegates. This joint resolution has passed the House, has the approval of the President and the Secretary of State, is tolerated by the Budget, and has the unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask permission for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 156) authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June-July, 1928, and providing for an appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the expenses of the delegates, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to accept the invitation of the British Government to participate in the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June-July, 1928, as set forth in the message of the President of January 5, 1928, printed as Senate Document No. 36, Seventieth Congress, first session, and to appoint delegates to said dairy congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the payment of the expenses of the delegates in attending such congress, including the compensation of employees, transportation, subsistence, or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), and such other expenses as the President shall deem proper.

SEC. 3. That the delegates shall make a report to Congress of the results and conclusions of the said dairy congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. HAWES. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce a statement of damage done by floods in the lower Mississippi Valley.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I did not quite hear the Senator's request with regard to something being printed in the body of the RECORD.

Mr. HAWES. That was my request.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will realize that there are certain rules of the Joint Committee on Printing which have the effect of law, and which can not be overcome by unanimous consent of this body.

Mr. HAWES. This statement will be of some interest to the Senate. It is a statement of the loss of $236,000,000 in one flood. It seems to me that it should go in the body of the RECORD, where it will be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and without objection the statement will be printed, as requested, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JANUARY 17, 1928.

Hon. HARRY B. HAWES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: 1. Having further reference to your letter of December 31, 1927, relative to damage caused by floods in the Mississippi Valley for the years 1882, 1883, 1893, 1897, 1903, 1907, 1912, 1913, 1916, 1920, 1922, and 1927, permit me to advise you as follows:

2. For the years 1882, 1883, 1893, and 1897 no recorded estimates of flood loss and damages are available. The losses for those years were probably not very great, as the territory was not so densely populated and there was less land in cultivation and fewer industries than in later years. In 1907 the flood damage appears to have been small, but no actual figured estimate is available. Estimated damages for the remaining years listed in your letter for the Mississippi Valley are:

1903	$40,000,000
1912	78,188,000
1913	12,213,000
1916	5,533,000
1920	7,088,000
1922	17,088,000

1927, variously estimated at $236,334,000 to $284,118,000.

3. The estimates as given herein must be considered as quite tentative, as it has been almost impossible to arrive at any real, satisfactory, or conclusive estimates even of actual or direct flood damages without taking into consideration economic or indirect losses.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT DEAKYNE,
Brigadier General, Acting Chief of Engineers.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1928.

Hon. HARRY HAWES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HAWES: I note with approval that you placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where it will be read by all classes of our citizens the statement of the United States Chamber of Commerce and of Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, as to the national responsibility in the matter of flood control.

Should you not add to this now a statement of the losses and damages caused by the flood of 1927 as prepared by the Mississippi River Flood Control Association, which is as follows:

Report of loss and damage by the 1927 floods in the Mississippi Valley in the States of Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not yield any longer for matters that are going to lead to debate. I want to have the conference report adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. For what purpose?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To have a short resolution read, and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. If it not going to lead to any debate, the Senator can have it read.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If it does, I shall withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate whether the estimates of immigration quotas, prepared by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor under section 11 of the act approved May 26, 1924, which were transmitted to the Senate by the President, together with two letters of the said Secretaries, on January 3 and 10, 1927, are still unsupported by responsible documentary evidence, as admitted in the second letter in question or in process of revision or improvement, and when in the latter case new figures will reach the Congress, accompanied by adequate and detailed explanation of the method of computation, or otherwise.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the resolution go over under the rule, please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I hope we may proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the conference report at length. I want to ask the senior Senator from Utah whether or not it is contemplated by this report that further conferences on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses will be held?

Mr. SMOOT. No. There are four amendments that had to be taken back to the House to be acted upon. If the House agrees to them, then the agreement will be complete. Those amendments were offered to the bill in the Senate, and the rules of the House require that they be returned to the House for action by the House before the conference report is finally agreed to. If the conference report is agreed to here now, however, and the House also agrees to the four amendments by the Senate that had to be returned to the House, then the agreement will be complete.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One more question, Mr. President. I want to ask the Senator from Utah whether or not the House conferees met on Senate amendment numbered 4, and whether or not the House conferees were willing to listen to the arguments which were made in behalf of the retention of that amendment.

The Senator will remember that at the time the bill was under consideration we reached an understanding that Senate amendment numbered 4 would go to conference, and the Senator suggested that those who desired to be heard would be heard by the conferees. Of course, I realize that the Senator could not speak for the House conferees; but it was the general understanding and the assumption at least which I made that the House conferees would sit with the Senate conferees when those hearings were held. The question which I ask the Senator is whether or not the House conferees did, as a matter of fact, sit while those who were interested in Senate amendment numbered 4 were being heard by the conferees?

Mr. SMOOT. The conferees on the part of the House would not sit with the conferees on the part of the Senate to hear discussion of the matter; but I will say to the Senator that the conferees on the part of the Senate gave every chance for anyone to come before the conferees, and I will say that both sides did appear before the conferees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before the Senate conferees?

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senate conferees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for the information. So the fact is developed, Mr. President, that in spite of the assurances which were given by the senior Senator from Utah, in good faith, that this matter would be further heard by the conferees, the conferees on the part of the House took what seems to me an extraordinary and untenable position and refused to hear any further arguments on the matter, and when an effort was made to hold a hearing they withdrew.

Mr. President, as I stated when this proposition was under consideration by the Senate, the item involved in this question, as I see it, and the important phase of it, is contained in that portion of the language of the House text which indirectly provides for the delivery of power from this project owned by the Flathead Indians of Montana to the Government at a ridiculously low rental.

It has been admitted on this floor by all persons, and I am informed that it was admitted before the Senate conferees in the hearing upon this proposition, that to diminish the amount of power for which this corporation, the Montana Power Co., or any other corporation, would pay by 15,000 horsepower is to diminish the income derived therefrom by the Indians.

The Montana Power Co., one of the bidders for this tremendously important site, admitted that in making their computation as to the rental which they would offer in their bid to pay to these Indians they reduced that rental in consideration of the 15,000 horsepower which they were to furnish the Government at a very low rate. In their communication, which is to be found on page 209 of the House hearings in 1928, they described the horsepower to be delivered at a low rental as, to quote their exact language:

> This offer was intended to be one of the items of compensation to the United States.

They go on further to say:

> We have offered to supply the Government for the use of the water users of the reservation and others all the power that can be developed by the small development at a cost very materially lower than the cost of the same power produced by the small development, so that in the case of the initial development, 1,850 kilowatt units, the savings will amount to $49,700 per year. This saving, capitalized at 6 per cent, is equivalent to a cash bonus of $828,000.

Mr. President, at the time this letter was written it was proposed to deliver to the Government at this low rate only 1,850 kilowatt units. It is now proposed that approximately 11,250 kilowatt units are to be furnished at this low rental.

All parties in interest in this matter are concerned for the development of this project, but I submit that it is neither good business nor a prudent proposition, so far as the Indians are concerned, nor is it sound for the Congress to establish the precedent of diminishing the total raw power value of this site by 15,000 horsepower, or by any other amount.

There are other projects in this country, I am informed, and I believe reliably so, where the Indians are the owners of the raw power sites. These sites in some instances are contiguous to reclamation projects, as is this site in Montana. Therefore, if this precedent is established, we will find it used in subsequent similar cases as an argument for a diminution of the total raw power value of the site so far as the Indians are concerned.

Mr. President, I believe that the Senate conferees have endeavored in good faith to secure either a modification of the House text or the acceptance of the Senate amendment, but in view of the extraordinary attitude taken on the part of the House conferees, they were unable to accomplish their purpose. I do not agree with the conferees, however, in acceding to the House conferees in this matter, under the circumstances. I believe that the Senate conferees should have insisted upon this amendment, and should have insisted that it be taken to the House of Representatives by the House conferees, just as other amendments were taken, as the Senator has stated, upon which there could be no agreement, and which are now before the House in the form of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to explain to the Senator that there is a great difference between the items mentioned, the four items that had to go back to the House, and the Flathead project amendment. The House put into the bill the provision for the Flathead power development, but the other four items the House did not put into the bill, and those items being legislation, they had to go back to the House. I have no doubt but that the House will agree to them, but even if all the conferees could have agreed, they would have had no power to do so, because of the fact that those items were legislation, and the House had not passed upon them, and therefore the items had to be taken back to the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that, and if I made any statement which gave the Senator the impression that I thought the amendments taken to the House were in the same position as Senate amendment No. 4, I am very glad that he corrected me. The point I am trying to make is that I believe that the Senate conferees should have insisted that this Senate amendment No. 4 be taken back to the House for instructions by that body to their conferees. This matter has never been at issue in the House upon its merits.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any parliamentary reason why this amendment could not be taken back to the House?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; there was no parliamentary reason why Senate amendment No. 4 should not have been included with the other amendments which were returned to the House for consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not clear why it was not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can tell the Senator why it was not. The House conferees would not yield. The House had passed upon this matter, and they would not yield, nor would they take it back to the House. That was the situation.

I will say further to the Senator that the rule is that wherever a House provision is in a bill, and the Senate strikes it out and the matter goes to conference, rather than have the bill fail, the Senate must yield. That has been the practice, that has been the rule, ever since I have been in the Senate of the United States, and I think the Senator understands that to be the fact.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is a practice; it is not written into the rules.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the universal practice, I will say to the Senator, as far as I know.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Furthermore, let me say, unless the Senator from New York desires to say something further——

Mr. COPELAND. Just one observation, if the Senator will yield. I do think this: That if there is the slightest doubt about this matter, if these Indians are being imposed upon, if it is not right, we ought to stay here all spring, if need be, insisting that this correction be made.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the Senator from Montana will state the other side of the case. I know there is a difference of opinion in Montana. Many people believe that what is provided in the bill is the very best thing possible to be done for the Indians. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin does not think it is the best thing. He thinks there is a loss there each year. The Senator from Montana has the figures, and he will present them to the Senate now in detail.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to hear the other side of the matter, but if there is any chance at all of our doing an injustice to these Indians we can not afford to be in the position of permitting legislation which will impose upon them. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to say to the Senator from New York that I quite concur in the view expressed by him, that we ought not to have any doubt about this matter. The matter was fully discussed on the floor when the bill was before us, and I thought there could not be any doubt then. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with his usual diligence interested himself in this matter, he gave it his usual careful attention and study, and participated in the discussion, and I tried to answer every question about it that anybody addressed to me, giving every item of information at my command. I supposed that the provisions were thoroughly well understood.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. As I understood the discussion, it resulted in the view upon the part of the Senate that the provision in the bill as it came from the House was not for the best, we did not assent to the position taken by the House, and the matter, of course, went to conference. I am sure the Senator does not mean by what he is stating now, speaking for myself, that I assented to the proposition as it now comes to us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I mean to assert is that the Senator from Utah did not at that time, after the discussion, pretend to assert to this body that there was anything unfair to the Indians in this proposition. If he did, it has escaped my recollection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if by that the Senator means that I approved of the proposition that the Government of the United States should expend approximately $300,000 for the construction of a distribution plant, and distribute the power that was generated by the power company, whichever power company——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not mean that at all. I understood perfectly well that the Senator was opposed to that provision; but that has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the question of what is due the Indians. I challenged that matter at the time, and called the attention of the Senate to the fact that we were then discussing not that question, not the question as to whether Congress should appropriate this money for a plant, but I was asking the Senate's attention to the question before us, as to whether any injustice was being done to the Indians, and the Senator certainly did not say that there was.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not address myself, as I recall, so much to the proposition now being discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin, because he presented it in a much clearer way than I could have presented it; he was more familiar with the matter, and, aside from that, he has facility of expression which enabled him to present the matter with the utmost clarity. I assented, in my mind at least, to the position which he took. It did seem to me that depriving the Indians of the benefit of the royalties that might be obtained for the power which was to be furnished the district at a nominal cost would operate to some extent as an injustice to the Indians. But I did not address myself particularly to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I was endeavoring to express. If the matter was not fully discussed at that time, so that everybody understands just exactly what the provision would accomplish, and is unable to form any opinion from the discussion as to whether any injustice would be done to the Indians, I trust this discussion will go on until everybody here shall have an opportunity to form a perfectly fair opinion about the matter, being advised as to what the facts are. But the discussion now is as to why the conferees did not send this back to the House, so that the matter could be debated in the House. If we are advised about the matter we will either have to confirm the report or reject the report and let the House take care of itself.

Mr. KING. I agree entirely with the Senator. I am sure the Senator from Montana made a very fair and very frank exposition of his views in regard to the matter. I think I understood exactly the situation, although I do not say that with absolute certainty. I acquit the Senator of any failure to disclose all the information within his possession with respect to all questions relating to the matter. I was very appreciative of the very clear and illuminating statement made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana by inference takes the position that discussion of how this matter was handled in conference is not pertinent to the subject now under discussion. I can not agree with the Senator. So far as I am personally concerned, and endeavoring to speak within the rule, it seems to me the House conferees, to put it mildly, took an extraordinary position with regard to the amendment. In order to confirm that, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] whether he was not surprised when the House conferees took the position that they would not listen to any argument concerning the matter, in view of his assurance given to the Senate in good faith that it would be taken up in conference and those who desired to be heard would be heard?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator to know that I requested the conferees to listen to both sides of the question. The House conferees took the position that they did not think the conferees of both Houses jointly had any right to go into a discussion of a matter which had passed the House one way and the Senate another way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator if that is not done continually in conferences?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not done continually.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But it has been done often.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is not that the way things get into conference? If the Senate acted the same as the House did on any proposition, it never would go to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked me if it was not very often the case that the conferees had hearings on items in dispute between the two Houses. I will say to the Senator that it is very, very seldom done, so far as conferences I have attended are concerned, but I see no reason why there should not be such hearings. I can not see why, if there were a question like this involved, and it should come to this body and we allowed it to go back to conference, the conferees should not hear the interested parties, but the House conferees decided otherwise and we could not do anything.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest objection to this matter going back to conference to enable those who are of different views to my own to be heard in the matter. If the Senator can give any kind of assurance that the House conferees will change their minds about the matter, I shall not object as far as I am concerned. But I desire to say in that connection that the measure was before the House, and if there was no discussion of it before the House it was because no one in the House cared to present the matter to that body at all. It came here with this provision in it.

This is not a matter of surprise to anybody at all. The matter has been under discussion for several years at least, and the people associated with the Senator from Wisconsin in opposition to this provision of the bill were entirely apprised of the matter. Why did they not voice their opposition to the bill when it was in the House? They have had an opportuntiy in the House to consider the matter and to debate it there; just as we had in the Senate. Can the Senator advise us why it was not discussed there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no information. I do know, however, that as matters of this kind are handled in the House there is often no opportunity offered to those who desire to discuss controversial items which members of the committee perhaps do not desire to have fully discussed to obtain the necessary time for the purpose. I do not know the facts about that, but I do know that the matter has been rather fully discussed in the Senate. So far as I am able to interpret the discussion which we had here at the time the bill was under consideration when reported from the Senate committee, there was a pretty general agreement that the provision for the furnishing of 15,000 horsepower to the Government at a reduced or nominal rate was tantamount to a reduction of the total revenues to be obtained by the Indians from this power site.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in the House the committee having the bill in charge in making up the bill listened to every interested party. There is where most of the discussion takes place on the House side. It is in the preparation and consideration of the bill in committee. When it comes to the Senate all we discuss are questions about which there is some doubt. I can not see what good it would do to refer the matter back to the conferees. When the conferees met, it was clear that the House conferees would not yield on this item. We might as well give up consideration of the bill if that were done. I think it would be just a waste of time to do it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the trouble was that the bill was not discussed before the subcommittee of the House which considered it. I have a copy of two letters which indicate that a request was made for a hearing and it was not granted. In fact, the letters were not replied to and there was apparently no discussion of the matter before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I can send to my committee room and obtain for the Senator a copy of the hearings on the bill in the House. I think it comprises a volume of between 400 and 500 pages. Every detail of this particular project was discussed in those hearings. I am perfectly willing to send to the committee room now for the hearings and show them to the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have here a copy of a letter signed by Mr. Grorud, general attorney for the Flathead tribal organization, who applied by letter on December 7, 1927, to the chairman of the subcommittee of the House having in charge the Interior Department appropriation bill, and asked that on the Flathead question he be heard. Mr. Grorud informs me that he received no reply to that letter.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the date of the letter?

Mr. FRAZIER. December 7. Under the same date here is another letter to the same chairman of the same subcommittee, signed by John Collier, executive secretary of the American Indian Defense Association (Inc.), asking that he be heard on this same Flathead question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Grorud was heard before the Senate committee. I am very sorry that I really made a mistake in connection with that matter. He asked that certain statements be printed in the record. We were in a hurry and I consented that they should go in. I had to apologize to the members of the House conference committee for those letters and statements. They are untrue, many of them, and not only that but it was the first time, in a hearing before a Senate committee, that I ever knew of such language, the most abusive language and charges against Members of the House. I was very sorry that it happened. I am quite sure that when Mr. CRAMTON and the House committee were out to the reservation, Mr. Grorud appeared before them at the time and had his hearing out there, as many other citizens had. I am told so by members of the conferees on the part of the House. I apologized to the conferees of the House and took the blame myself, because I did not have time to read all the letters that he asked to put in the record. If I had read them, I will say to the Senator frankly, they would not have gone into the record. Mr. CRAMTON said that was the second time the Senate has allowed things to go into the record that were absolutely untrue. I was very sorry that I was at fault in letting them go in, but I simply did not have the time to read them. There was page after page that he put in the record that I had no idea he was going to put in it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me correct one statement that has been made. I agree with the Senator with reference to putting things in the record which were abusive of any Congressman, but when the Senator states that a hearing was had on this particular matter on the reservation and that the Indians presented their side of it, I think he is entirely mistaken. As I recollect it, when Mr. CRAMTON was out there this question was not taken up, or at least none of the Indians presented their side of it at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Indians were there or not. I could not say as to that, but I do know that Mr. CRAMTON was there, I know the matter was discussed, and I know that is the report we had.

Mr. WHEELER. But the opposition to it did not have a hearing on it, as I recall. I was there myself.

Mr. SMOOT. I judge from what Congressman CRAMTON said that he had met Mr. Grorud there and knew him very well.

Mr. WHEELER. He met him there.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I now have the House hearings, and instead of the document being some four hundred-odd pages, as I first thought, it comprises 1,196 pages. There [indicating] are the hearings before the House committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But not on this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. On the Interior Department appropriation bill itself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the important matter, so far as those who desire to be heard is concerned, is whether their statement appears in the 1,196 pages which the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that on page 327 begin the hearings on the construction of an irrigation system on the Flathead irrigation projects of Montana. Mr. CRAMTON made a statement, which included a statement of what had happened upon the reservation in the past, together with a statement from the Department of the Interior. Then Mr. Reed appeared in behalf of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Following him was Mr. Meritt, the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Following his statement was the statement of Walter L. Pope, representing the commissioners of the Flathead irrigation district. They all appeared before the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am not insinuating that some of the letters or statements Mr. Grorud made before the Senator's committee should not have gone into the record, but I do feel that, as general counsel for the Flathead Indians of Montana, he should have been heard before the House committee on this matter and should have had an opportunity to present the Indians' side of the question. Mr. Collier, in the same way, representing the American Indian Defense Association, should have been heard. They were both heard by the Senate committee, and I know that they appreciated that opportunity and I think the Indians they represent appreciated it very much. But I think they should have been heard by the House committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, because of interruptions I have held the floor much longer than I intended. I merely want to sum up by saying that I trust the Senate will reject the conference report and ask for a further conference with the House. It seems to me that the Senate in this matter should exercise its right to ask for a further conference.

Let me say that Mr. Kerr, vice president and general manager of the Montana Power Co., stated that 1,850 kilowatt units, the figure under discussion at that time, capitalized at 6 per cent, amounted to $820,000. Taking that computation, his own computation, and applying it to the 15,000 horsepower, capitalized at 6 per cent, it amounts to approximately $5,000,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that when I was recently in the city of Cleveland the other party who put in a bid—a man by the name of Wheeler—from St. Paul called to see me with reference to this power site. I told him about the bid that had been made by the Montana Power Co.; that they were proposing to furnish to the Reclamation Service 15,000 horsepower, 10,000 horsepower, I think it was, at 1 mill per kilowatt and 5,000 horsepower at 2½ mills per kilowatt. He informed me that if his bid was accepted he would be very glad to furnish power to the Government at that rate mentioned; that he would consider that a very good proposition for his concern, and that he could make money furnishing power to the Reclamation Service at that price. That being the case, it would rather seem to me that nothing should be deducted from the Indians by reason of the fact that the Reclamation Service would want to enter into a contract with the successful bidder at the above prices.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; but we now have the statement made by the vice president and general manager of the Montana Power Co. that his company did make a deduction when it fixed the rental which it would pay.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that, but the point that I want to make with reference to this bill is that, notwithstanding the fact that there is some misapprehension in the minds of some persons concerning this bill, there is not a single thing in the bill that would warrant the power company to take one 5-cent piece away from the Indians, and there is not anything in the bill that would warrant the Government in making it a condition precedent to the letting of the contract that power would be furnished it at a specified price. I am assuming that when one or two or three bidders go before the Power Commission it will be the duty of the Power Commission to look into the proposed bids and see who is the best bidder for the power site and that the rentals under the terms of the bill will be turned over to the Indians. That is the only thing under this bill that the Power Commission can look into.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In answer to the Senator's suggestion I desire to say that, in the first place, one of the members of the Power Commission is the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He naturally has charge of the matter so far as the Indians are concerned. We have provided in this bill for the expenditure of upward of $300,000 for the building of the distribution system and the other items that are included. I believe that the provision for the distribution system is being placed in the bill with the specific idea that 15,000 horsepower or some such amount of horsepower will be furnished from this project at a nominal or very low rental. Therefore, in so far as this provision can do so, by indirection it practically makes it necessary for the Power Commission in considering this matter to take into account the amount of money which Congress has appropriated and to secure a bid which will permit the use of the distributing system which is to be constructed.

Mr. WHEELER. I can not agree at all with the Senator in that contention for this reason: As I have stated, the bill provides for the appropriation of, we will say, two or three hundred thousand dollars, whatever the amount may be. Then it provides that that sum shall be used for the building of a distributing plant. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent the Power Commission saying to any bidder, "You must make a reasonable or a low bid on the power to be furnished to the Government before you will get this contract."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not arguing that the language is specifically in the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Or that it binds the Power Commission or that it is directory. What I am saying is that the language is in the bill, the money is being appropriated, and the commission, like any other commission, will take into account what Congress has done in the matter. It seems to me, therefore, that the Senator from Montana is splitting hairs when he says because we can not point to directory language in the House text that, therefore, there is nothing to the contention that power will be required to be furnished by the successful bidder at a low rental.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not splitting hairs about it at all. I am merely reading the plain, ordinary language of the proposed statute itself, and I submit that no power company would have any right under the terms of the bill to take into consideration the things that the Senator fears are going to be taken into consideration. That is merely suspicion on the part of those who are taking that position.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not suspicion, Mr. President.

Mr. WHEELER. It is nothing more than a suspicion pure and simple. There is not anything in the language of the bill to warrant that kind of a suspicion.

Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I would be delighted to see the Government of the United States undertake this development; but I have taken the position that the site belongs to the Indians; that the Indians have a right to lease it, and they want to lease it, and they have been here for two or three years seeking to lease this site. I have insisted that they should get everything out of it; I have stood here constantly and fought to see that they did get everything out of it; but when they come here and say and when the Senator from Wisconsin stands here on his feet and says that because of certain language in the bill that the Congress of the United States must assume that the Power Commission is going to do something that the language in the bill does not give them any right to do, I say that I can not go along with them on that suggestion at all. There is not anything in the bill to warrant such an assumption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the language is in the bill. It provides for the building of the distributing system.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the commission when it comes to make the lease will not be unaware of the fact that Congress has put that provision in the bill and has appropriated for the construction.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me finish the sentence, please. When that bid is before the commission they will of necessity take into consideration the action of Congress. The Senator from Montana, I believe, knows as well as does the Senator from Wisconsin, or better than he, the long negotiations that have gone forward in this matter.

The Senator from Montana participated in the consideration of this proposition last year before he went to China, and he knows that negotiations in connection with the bid of the Montana Power Co.'s were participated in, though perhaps unofficially, by officers of the Department of the Interior and by the secretary of the Power Commission, and that that bid, so far as can be without official action, has a quasi-judicial status. When the Senator from Montana now says in view of those facts that the incorporation of provision for this transmission system and the appropriation of this money will not be taken into consideration by the Power Commission, I can not follow his reasoning.

Mr. WHEELER. I am merely assuming that the Power Commission is going to do its duty. So far as I am concerned, as I said a moment ago, the Senator from Wisconsin knows that the Indians want the development to take place; they want to lease the site. I say there is not a thing in this bill that would warrant the commission doing anything else but giving the Indians every dollar that should go to them, and if the bill shall be passed and applications shall be made to the Power Commission, I shall insist as strongly as I can that the Indians shall receive every dollar to which they may be entitled and can get.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no doubt the Senator will try to protect the interests of the Indians, but it is one thing for the Senator from Montana to make an individual appeal to the Power Commission and it is another thing for Congress by indirection to fasten this proposition in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER. But suppose that the Congress of the United States, instead of appropriating $300,000, had appropriated sufficient money to build a transmission line all over the State of Montana in an independent bill—assume that it was not in this bill at all, but that Congress as an independent proposition had appropriated money for the reclamation project—would the Senator then contend that because the Congress of the United States had enacted legislation for the purpose of building a power transmission line over the State of Montana that the Power Commission should take that fact into consideration in leasing this power site, which belongs to the Indians, and insist that the power company should give power to the Reclamation Service at a lower cost than it otherwise would?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will include one more assumption in his hypothetical case, my answer to his question will be yes. If the Senator will say that before this appropriation was made by Congress there was a bid before the Power Commission on which interested parties had conferred, at which conference the representatives of the State of Montana in the Senate were present, and at which the secretary of the Power Commission was present, and that bid was pending before the commission, I would say that undoubtedly the commission would take it into consideration.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but the Senator is assuming a state of facts that is not correct under the present status of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator to correct me in so far as I am wrong, for I do not desire to make an inaccurate statement.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say that the Senator is assuming facts that are not correct. In the first place, when the bill came up a year ago the Representatives and Senators from the State of Montana got together with the Reclamation Service and with all of those interested in the projects, including the representative of the Indians.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the secretary of the Power Commission. Was he not there also?

Mr. WHEELER. No; he was not present. The Reclamation Service, the Representatives and Senators from Montana, and the representative of the Indians were present. At that time I insisted, and so did my colleague from Montana, that the tentative agreement that was submitted by the power company and the bureau should not be permitted to be entered into because it did not protect the rights of the Indians. Yet, in view of that fact, in view of the fact that both my colleague and myself protested that the Indians should get every dollar that was coming to them out of the transaction, the Senator from Wisconsin stands here and says that we assume that the tentative agreement that was entered into at that time is going through. The truth of the matter is that we protested against that agreement going through, and by reason of our protestations that tentative agreement, I am assuming, ended, and because of our protestations and by reason of our protestations at that time the Indians, instead of getting 30 cents out of every dollar, are to get to-day every 5-cent piece of it; at least that is my understanding. I understand that is the position, because of that conference, that the Secretary of the Interior has taken to-day, and that, according to my understanding, is the position the Power Commission is going to take, and that everybody who has anything to do with this project is going to take in connection with the leasing of this site.

If these people are deceiving me, if I am not right about it, then, of course, there might be something in the Senator's contention. I am assuming, however, that when the Secretary of the Interior says that every dollar of this money is going to the Indians, he is saying what he intends to do. I am assuming that when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says the same thing he is going to insist on it. I am assuming that when everybody connected with the matter says the same thing, that is what they are going to do. I can not assume that they are not going to do that; and I say to the Senator that as far as this provision is concerned in this bill it has not anything more to do with this contract than if it were a separate and distinct bill passed by the Congress of the United States authorizing an appropriation of $350,000 or $360,000 or $400,000 for the building of a transmission line.

I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin would not say that if the people out there in the Reclamation Service wanted to come here and have an appropriation made of $300,000 or $400,000 for the purpose of building a transmission line, and wanted to buy power from somebody, they should not be permitted to do it. I do not think the Senator would take that position; and I do not think he would say that if they could buy it for a cent per kilowatt-hour, or a mill per kilowatt-hour, of 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour, he would object to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should object to it if it was to be deducted from the amount of revenue received by the Indian tribe who owned the site.

Mr. WHEELER. But it should not be, and I do not think it will be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator from Montana think that 15,000 horsepower or any such block of horsepower can be obtained from this site at a mill?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And that that amount will not reduce the total received by the Indian tribe?

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly; because of the fact that Mr. Walter H. Wheeler, who is the other bidder, told me in the city of Cleveland the other day that he would be glad to have that contract. He has put in a bid. As I recollect, it amounts to about $1.12 per kilowatt-hour; and he told me that in the event his bid was accepted he would be glad to furnish the irrigation system or the Reclamation Service power at the price mentioned in the proposal of the Montana Power Co., and that if he could get that contract he could make money.

Under those circumstances, what excuse is there for the Power Commission to make it a condition precedent that they should have to furnish it; and what excuse would there be for the Power Commission to reduce the rates to any bidder by reason of the fact that they were getting this horsepower at these prices, when an engineer of the standing that I assume Mr. Wheeler has says that he would be delighted to furnish it to them at the amount of his bid, and that he could make money by so doing?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it follows as a matter of arithmetic that so far as the horsepower furnished to the Reclamation Service is concerned, in so far as that horsepower is furnished at a nominal rental it will reduce the total value of the horsepower of the raw power site.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but the Senator must take into consideration the fact that the market at the particular place where this power site is located is very limited. The power site will develop much more power than they can possibly sell in this district for a long time to come. Consequently, whoever gets the power I am sure will be delighted to sell the power at 1 mill per kilowatt-hour for 10,000 horsepower, and 2½ mills for 5,000 horsepower. Mr. Wheeler is an engineer of undoubted ability, and I think undoubted integrity, although I am not personally acquainted with him except that I have met him; but he tells me that that would be a good contract for him, and that he could make money on it, and that he would be very glad personally to do it if he got the contract; and he is willing, as I understand, to bid $1.12 and still furnish this power to the Government at 1 mill for 10,000 horsepower and 2½ mills for 5,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. Is there any stipulation about how much the Indians are to receive from this water-power site or this valuable asset?

Mr. WHEELER. Any stipulation where?

Mr. BLAINE. In the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Not a thing.

Mr BLAINE. What guaranty, then, have they that they will receive anything?

Mr. WHEELER. The bill provides that it shall be leased in accordance with the water power act, according to my recollection; and the water power act provides that all of the revenues from this project shall go to the Indians.

Mr. BLAINE. Another question, if my colleague will continue to yield. If this power is sold to the Reclamation Service at cost, clearly the Indians will receive nothing for it.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BLAINE. I say, if it is sold at cost to the Reclamation Service, the Indians will receive nothing.

Mr. WHEELER. No; the Senator is mistaken about that. No matter who buys this 15,000 horsepower, the Indians are going to get paid.

Mr. BLAINE. How much?

Mr. WHEELER. Whatever is bid on it; a dollar a horsepower, or $1.12, or $1.50, or whatever the bid is. That will depend upon who bids on it, and who the highest bidder is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but the point is whether any bidder, considering that he has to furnish 15,000 horsepower at a low cost figure, will thereby diminish his bid upon the total amount of power produced.

Mr. WHEELER. But when they are giving it to them for 1 mill per kilowatt-hour, or 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour, while I am not an expert on it, I do not think that is furnishing it at cost; and Mr. Wheeler stated, as I said a moment ago, that he would be glad to furnish it and would be glad to get the contract, because he could make money by furnishing it at that price.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the Reclamation Service to receive it at cost?

Mr. WHEELER. They are to receive it at what they can buy it for. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that there is not any condition precedent. There is nothing in this bill that makes it a condition precedent that they shall be entitled to it at cost, or at any other price.

Mr. BLAINE. If my colleague will yield, I might make this suggestion: This situation reminds me of the agreement entered into between the white man and the Indian on the game hunt. They went in cahoots, the white man got the game and the Indian got the cahoots.

Mr. WHEELER. The difference between that and this, let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin, is that if the Indians would say, as to this power site, which belongs to them, I think—I have always contended that it belonged to them—"We do not want to develop it, we want to hold it until such time as the Government of the United States will come out there and develop it and sell power to the people of the State of Montana at cost or anything else," I should be delighted to see them do it, and I should be delighted to see them hold it until such time. But here are several thousand Indians out there who are in a miserable condition, poor and poverty stricken, and they are anxious to lease it and get the revenues from it so that they can enjoy it in their lifetime. Under those circumstances, I do not think I have any right to stand up here in the Congress of the United States and say that they should not lease what I consider to be their own property.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that is the argument that is made for every proposition of this nature. When the Indians' consent is obtained to a proposition, it is always argued, in committee and on the floor of the Senate, that regardless of whether the proposition is a wise one or not, it should be accepted.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just one more word and then I will yield the floor because I have taken a great deal more time than I intended, largely because of the interruptions.

I merely want to say that I am convinced that if the House text is enacted, a provision will be contained in the lease given to the successful bidder providing for the furnishing of this amount of horsepower at a low or nominal sum, and in my judgment the successful bidder will no doubt be the Montana Power Co. I feel that an injustice is being done to these Indians, that a bad precedent is being established, and I have contended on this floor for what I believe to be the rights of the Indians in this matter.

I know that both Senators from Montana have stated that the Indians are very desirous of having this project leased.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator himself know that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was not implying by what I said that there was any question about the fact. I say that both Senators from Montana have stated, and if it will please the Senator I will say that so far as I know all parties admit, that the Indians desire to have this power project leased. It is very easy to understand that, because it is held out to the Indians that they are to receive $100,000 or more per year in revenue. Nevertheless, we can not get away from the fact that this is one of the largest power developments in the country. We can not get away from the further fact, in my judgment, that by the incorporation of the House text by implication we take a position which will be given consideration by the Power Commission in granting the lease upon this project. Therefore I hope that the conference report will be rejected and that a further conference will be asked on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say just a word, and that is that I have not the slightest objection to the bill going back to conference. So far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly willing to see that done if it would do any good. I do not know whether it would or whether it would not.

I do not like the implication that has been given out that the Indians themselves have been induced to lease this power site. That has been intimated on the floor of the Senate, and it has been intimated in some of the papers that the Government ought to operate this project, and that some of us were trying to "put something across" for the power company.

The truth about the matter is that the Indians themselves have wanted to lease this project for a number of years. The attorneys and the representatives and the Indian Defense Society and everybody else connected with the matter have wanted to lease it for the Indians. They have wanted to see it leased. The Indians themselves came down here opposing Government operation or the building by the Government of the plant that was authorized a few years ago.

It has been the Indians who have wanted to lease this and nobody else. So I say that any inference in the matter that anybody else is trying to get the Indians to lease it is an unfair inference.

I do not think I can add anything to what I said a moment ago with reference to this bill. There is not a thing in the record, there is not a thing in the bill that even intimates that the Power Commission shall have any right whatsoever to do other than to give the Indians every dollar of revenue that is derived from the leasing of this power site; and if there is anybody on this floor who can point out to me one thing in the bill which would give the slightest opportunity for the Power Commission to put that sort of a construction upon the measure, then I would vote against it. But I do not like to have the idea thrown out that everybody who has anything to do with this is going to violate the spirit or the letter of the law.

Mr. President, I ask to have included as a part of my remarks certain letters and telegrams and a petition which I have received from the State of Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Jocko district commissioners oppose further new construction. Inadequate water supply. Majority proposed expenditures not desired.

ST. IGNATIUS, MONT., February 8, 1928.

Senator B. K. WHEELER,
Washington, D. C.:

Commissioner Dellevo, Flathead irrigation district, in Washington on Flathead project matter. His plan secret as far as mission irrigation district is concerned. Dellevo a farmer politician. Landowners not aware of his status of what contract portends. His argument is for power development regardless of reclamation reaction to farmers. The bait of power construction in connection of signing contract is used for coercion threat and bat. Missoulian and Pioneer print only what they know will assist Montana power development. Pope recited his professional interpretation of contract which, if valid, would change wording and sense of contract, but probably only his opinion, as it changes many features of construction program, concluding dissatisfied farmers can move. Pope's fee to Washington $50 per day and expenses. Please support S. 2863.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS MISSION IRRIGATION DISTRICT,

J. H. NEWTON, Commissioner.

RONAN, MONT., February 7, 1928.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: At the request of a large number of farmers residing in the vicinity of Ronan and in what is known as the Ronan laterals, Pablo subdivision, and Pablo division supplement, formerly known as the Crow unit of the Flathead irrigation project, I am herewith mailing you a petition signed by 77 landowners in this unit who are opposed to appropriation for construction of laterals in this unit and to signing proposed repayment contract in hands of irrigation district commissioners, and they also ask that this unit, and particularly their lands, be excluded from the project entirely.

I am mailing copies of this petition to Senator WALSH, Congressmen EVANS and LEAVITT, also the Department of the Interior, and CRAMTON, and am also informing them that the original petition is in your hands.

These landowners respectfully ask that yourself and the other Montana Members of Congress use your best efforts to defeat the appropriation for Ronan laterals and secure the exclusion of this portion of the project from the Flathead irrigation project entirely.

About 90 per cent of the landowners living upon their land in this unit have signed this petition. The Kiwanis Club of Polson, Polson Chamber of Commerce, Lake County Bankers' Association, merchants' associations, and irrigation commissioners, and their representatives and their lawyers do not express the will of the actual landowners in this unit, and I am sure this is true as to the entire project. The people are waking up, and it looks as if the majority are going to refuse to sign the proposed repayment contract. The landowners are much interested in your bill fixing charge at $40 per acre; the principal objection to repayment contract is the fact that it fails to fix a definite amount to be charged.

Should there be anything further you desire in connection with this matter, let me know and the same will be supplied at once.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Most respectfully,

JOHN P. SWEE.

Petition to United States Indian Irrigation Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

To Hon. B. K. WHEELER, United States Senate; Hon. T. J. WALSH, United States Senate; Hon. JOHN M. EVANS, House of Representatives; Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT, House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, owners of land described opposite our respective names, said land being located in what is known as the Crow unit of the Flathead irrigation project in the State of Montana, and the said unit being located north of Crow Creek and east of Mud Creek and also a portion of land bordering on Mud Creek and west of Mud Creek.

I

That we are also opposed to the signing of the proposed repayment contract now in the hands of the Flathead irrigation district commissioners.

II

That we are also opposed to the building and construction of laterals and ditches in the said unit and adjacent to the town of Ronan, for the reason that the cost of the placing of the said land under irrigation is prohibitory and unwarranted, as there is a sufficient amount of moisture in the said territory to produce good crops without irrigation.

III

We, the undersigned, do also respectfully ask that all of the said land in the said Crow unit, and particularly the land owned by these petitioners, be excluded from the Flathead irrigation project.

Petition to United States Indian Irrigation Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

We, the undersigned, owners of land described opposite our respective names, said land being located in what is known as the Crow unit of the Flathead irrigation project in the State of Montana, and the said unit being located north of Crow Creek and east of Mud Creek, and also a portion of land bordering on Mud Creek and west of Mud Creek.

I

That we wish to state that we are opposed to the signing of the proposed repayment contract now in the hands of the Flathead irrigation district commissioners.

II

That we are also opposed to the building and construction of laterals and ditches in the said unit and adjacent to the town of Ronan, for the reason that the costs of the placing of the said land under irrigation is prohibitory and unwarranted, as there is a sufficient amount of moisture in the said territory to produce good crops without irrigation.

III

We, the undersigned, do also respectfully ask that all of the said land in the said Crow unit and particularly the land owned by these petitioners be excluded from the Flathead irrigation project.

Name: Charles Ferguson; address, Missoula, Mont.; description, south half southeast quarter, section 13, township 21, range 20.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a great deal in the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I do not see that any harm could come from asking the House to consider this provision. That is frequently done. The Senate adopted this amendment, it went over to the House, and has been rejected in conference. The House conferees have so far, I understand, declined to let the House take any action on it. I do not see that any harm could come from sending it back.

I am reminded of what one of the Indian chiefs who is now in Washington said the other day, illustrating how the Indians were imposed upon by a great deal of such legislation as this. He said a white man found a cow with a calf, and he tied the calf and milked the cow. He got a great big pan full of milk; he set the pan upon the shelf and after a while the cream rose on it. The white man skimmed the cream off and took it for himself and carried the skimmed milk out and gave it to the calf. [Laughter.]

I suggest that we stop that sort of legislation, and do justice to these Indians. I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin for a further conference on the subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant and nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KING. That is for the purpose of the further consideration of the conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I dare say I shall be acquitted of any undue favoritism toward the power interests in general or the Montana Power Co. in particular. When the matter was before the Senate upon the consideration of the bill I said whatever I thought was necessary to apprise the Senate of the conditions.

This, as has been very properly said, is one of the great power sites of the country. At the time the Flathead Reservation was opened up for settlement in the year 1909 the power sites were reserved, along with certain timberlands and villa sites about Flathead Lake. The act provided that lands should be allotted to the Indians within the reservation, and the allotments were made. It was then provided that the surplus lands should be classified and that they might be entered by homesteaders paying the appraised price of the land, provision having been made in the act for the irrigation of a part of them, so that the settlers taking up the surplus land had an election either to take lands which lay under the ditches and canals to be constructed and capable of irrigation thereby or to take lands at a lesser price above the ditches and canals and not capable of irrigation.

The lands below the ditch generally were appraised at $7 per acre, and the homesteader was obliged not only to comply with the homestead law in all its particulars as applied to the general domain but to pay into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the Indians the appraised price of $7, while above the canal and ditch he was obliged to pay only about $2.50 per acre. That money went into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the Flathead Indians and is there held, except so far as it has been disbursed, as a fund for those Indians.

At the same time it was contemplated that there should be power developed as a part of the irrigation project and for the purpose of elevating water from the river through this power to help out in the irrigation project. Work was inaugurated to that end. In other words, the power site to a certain extent was to be made available to the settlers upon the project for the purpose of pumping water to carry on the work of irrigation, and something like $101,000 was spent in the development of the power site for the sole and exclusive purpose of pumping water for the irrigation project. That is what was known as the Newell tunnel development. It was proposed to cut a tunnel through the adjacent rocks, making a straight shoot for the river instead of the natural curved course. That proposition, however, was abandoned. That is to say, the project for pumping water was abandoned and there was substituted for it a gravity system by which the water was carried along at the face of the Lovely Mission Range, the supply being furnished by various streams coming down from that range. However, for the purposes contemplated by the act of Congress opening the reservation, the Government of the United States appropriated the water of the Flathead River for irrigation as well as power in connection with the project, pursuant to a law of the State of Montana which authorized the Government of the United States to make the appropriation in aid of the irrigation project. The settlers upon the reservation accordingly have always maintained that under repeated acts of Congress they had an interest in the development of power upon the Flathead River.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. KING. Was the paramount purpose in the beginning the production of power or irrigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Power was merely incident to the irrigation project.

Mr. KING. I can not quite understand how they could conceive that it would be a profitable venture or project if they had to pump water. I was wondering if the idea in the beginning was that it was to be a pumping irrigation project or a gravity irrigation project.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was to be both. It was contemplated that certain sections of the reservation, as I remember it, should be irrigated by the water that should be elevated by pumping and certain other sections by the gravity system.

With respect to that feature of the matter, to which some little attention has thus far been paid, I had inserted in the RECORD, when this matter was before the Senate upon the consideration of the bill, a discussion of the whole subject by Mr. Walter L. Pope, the attorney for the settlers on the project, setting forth their view about the matter. I want to read from that article so prepared. He said:

There is one other fact that should be borne in mind and that is that under the provisions of what is now section 7099 of the Revised Code of Montana of 1921, the United States is permitted to appropriate the water of streams or lakes within the State of Montana for the same purposes for which private individuals may make such appropriation, such appropriations to be indicated by proper filings and to be held valid for a period of three years after the filing of notice. Pursuant to this act the project officials on March 29, 1910, filed claims for the use of water from the Flathead River at Newell Tunnel power site for power and irrigation purposes. These filings have been renewed every three years thereafter, the last filing having been made on January 26, 1925. It would appear, however, that while these filings might operate to reserve certain rights to the use of the water, it would not follow that they did give any title or right to the power site itself.

It, therefore, seems clear that the power site here in question has always been regarded by both Congress and the department officials as a portion of the reclamation project itself as fully as any of the reservoir sites. All plans and surveys for the project have included the power development at this point; work has been prosecuted there on behalf of the project and appropriations have been made for the specific purpose of continuing development of the power plant. It would, therefore, seem impossible to deny that the project itself has a real and substantial equity not only in the waters but in the power site itself and the evidence indicates that the congressional reservation of the site was made with a view to making the power site available for the project. It seems proper to say also that each landowner within the project has a substantial interest in this site as part and parcel of his water right and that the settlers might justly complain if they were to be deprived of the benefits which it has always been anticipated the project and the users thereunder would derive from the development of the power site. Attention is called to the fact that the expectation of the settler that his land would be irrigated from this system led to the purchases of these lands and payments into the Indian funds which otherwise would probably have not been made.

He concluded as follows:

It is therefore submitted that the project has a real and substantial interest and equity, not only in the right to use the water flowing in the Flathead River but in the power site itself, and that Congress can not with justice to the settlers under the project make disposition of this site without some compensation to the project and to those having water rights thereunder. It is not to be understood, however, that the rights and interests here asserted could be enforced in the courts in the face of an act of Congress to the contrary. The line of argument here suggested as the proper one must be presented to Congress, which is a court of last resort, for Congress speaks for the United States, which is both owner of the project and trustee for the tribe. But it is believed that even if Congress should by law deprive the project and its settlers of the use of revenues of the power site, Congress would in that case feel obligated to make commensurate compensation to the settlers in the form of a reduction of the construction costs which they are required to repay.

I read this simply for the purpose of showing that the settlers upon the project insist, and insist with some measure of reason, that they have, by virtue of various acts of Congress, an interest in the power site. They insist that they have appropriated the water for irrigation or power purposes pursuant to laws of the State of Montana, and that they ought not to be deprived of those rights.

I do not stop to discuss now, Mr. President, whether those contentions are well founded or ill founded. My judgment is that the settlers have been misled about the matter; that the power sites, as I have repeatedly declared, are the properties of the Indians. I do not speak about the water rights by reason of the appropriations. I call attention to the fact that there is a well-founded dispute between the settlers upon the project and the Indians as to whether the Indians, as a matter of fact, in view of the legislation of Congress, do own absolutely, and without any limitation whatever, these power sites.

In that situation of affairs the Congress in the year 1926 enacted legislation which provided that the Government should go out and develop the Newell power site by making appropriations for its development. Again, they reaffirmed that legislation in 1927. It at no time had my approval at all. I always thought it was an unwise thing and, more than that, I thought it was unjust to the Indians. But nobody was objecting. I wrote home to Montana about the matter, but nobody was interested in the matter. No one was here representing the Indians against the legislation, and so it went through.

That is the way the matter stands now. Under the existing law it is contemplated that the Newell Tunnel site shall be developed for the benefit of the project without any return whatever to the Indians.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in this connection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. In case the conference report is rejected and the item does not go through, what will be the result?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the point I was trying to reach. I have told about the legislation of 1926 and 1927. That was in the appropriation bills. It provided that a certain appropriation should be made for the construction of the power project. It provided how the returns or the profits from the project should be distributed. The profits were to be used, in the first place, to reimburse the Government for construction costs. In the second place, they were to be used for the purpose of reducing the cost of the construction of the Camas division of the project, which runs away up over $100. In the third place, whatever was left was to be applied to reducing the cost of the entire project.

As I said, the Indians are to get nothing whatever out of it at all. That is the situation which confronts us to-day. If the legislation is not enacted, then the legislation of 1926 and 1927 will stand. That was simply legislation concerning the disposition of the appropriation which was provided thereby. Whether the remainder of it will stand or not, I do not undertake to say. Whether the legislation falls with the appropriation which has lapsed because nothing has been done and no effort has been made to utilize the appropriation either of 1926 or 1927, I do not undertake to say. But in any case, it stands in the way of any development of the project and will stand in the way. The Water Power Commission, authorized to dispose of this matter by virtue of the act of 1920, will do nothing about it until that legislation is out of the way.

Mr. CURTIS. The appropriation would lapse and go back into the Treasury; but I wish to ask the Senator from Montana if he has considered and has at hand the figures as to the amount of money which has already been expended out of the Indian funds in the Treasury from which expenditure nothing has yet come? Does the Senator know how much has been expended? I understand the amount has been several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand there has been a very large amount expended in the construction of the irrigation project.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I am asking about.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is that it runs considerably over $2,000,000. I had the figures here a moment ago, but they have been mislaid. However, that sum is only for the irrigation project, and that, of course, is available only to Indians who have selected their lands under the canals or to their grantees, and many of them have sold their lands to white settlers.

Now, the proposition is to get rid of the legislation of 1926 and 1927 and put back into the hands of the Power Commission the authority granted to them by the act of 1920 to grant a permit for the development of this power.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before proceeding, will the Senator from Montana suffer an interruption, because I want to obtain information?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the lands belonged to the Indians and the Government agreed to purchase such lands as were sold to white settlers for $7 an acre.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. The act provided for giving to the Indians their allotments, each Indian receiving a certain number of acres of land. The remainder of the lands became open to settlement under the homestead law, the land being appraised and valued. The homesteaders were permitted to come in and appropriate the lands under the homestead law, but, in addition to complying with the homestead law the settlers were required to pay into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the Indians the appraised price of the land.

Mr. KING. That is what I understood. First the Indians received their allotments, and then the remainder of the land was thrown open to persons under the homestead law, they to pay into the Treasury for the benefit of Indians $7 an acre.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of the land was appraised as high as $30 or $40 an acre.

Mr. KING. Who was to pay the expense of inaugurating and completing the irrigation project? Was that to come out of the Indians' funds, or out of the Government of the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was contemplated—and that plan was pursued—that appropriations should be made by the Government of the United States; just as in the case of all irrigation projects, that the money should be advanced and repaid to the United States.

Mr. KING. Was the Government to furnish to the Indians free of charge water for the lands which had been allotted to them?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Under the original act so much of the cost of construction as was chargeable to the Indian lands was to be paid out of the fund then accumulated in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. From the sale of the lands?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the sale of the lands; but it was afterwards realized that that was unjust to the Indians who had taken lands above the project, and who got no benefit whatever from it; so we amended the law and simply provided that the fund should be invaded only so far as represented the part of the Indians having lands under the project; and so the share of this fund of each Indian having land under the project is subject to a charge for the construction of the irrigation project.

Mr. KING. Pursuing the matter a little further—perhaps it is repetition but I want these facts in my mind because they are rather complicated to a person who is not familiar with the subject, as is the Senator from Montana—the Indians claim that the water power belongs to them and the white settlers who acquired lands, paying $7 an acre, and made contracts with the Government for the purpose of buying water from the Government claim that they ought to be entitled, if not to all, at least to a portion of the benefits arising from the development of power?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is their claim.

Mr. KING. That controversy has not been settled, but it is not particularly involved in the matter here before us except in an indirect way?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is involved only indirectly, and it is involved just simply in this way: The Montana Power Co., realizing the controversy and contest between these two conflicting interests with reference to this power site, makes a proposition that it thinks will make an appeal to both the parties interested. That is the situation as it presents itself here.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator concludes, I should be very glad if he would refer, if he chooses, to the proposition that there is a plan here to project the Federal Government into the development and distribution of power; that it is a sort of innovation which will be imported into other proposals for the development of power upon the Indian reservation, and put the Government into the power business in competition with the power systems which have been developed by private capital within the various States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Again, if the Senator will permit me, I trust that we will not get away from the question of the interest of the Indians. I am trying to satisfy whatever misgivings my friend from New York may have about the rights of the Indians in this matter.

Mr. KING. I did not mean that the Senator should answer the question now, but before he concluded. I did not want to interrupt him again.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am able now to give the information the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] asked for. The amount expended on the irrigation project thus far—that is, appropriated for the project, is $4,922,760. There has been appropriated for the use of the Indians, however, not reimbursable at all but just so much appropriated by the Government of the United States, during the time that I have been here since 1913, $231,158.33. That sum is in the nature of a gift to the Indians on the Flathead Reservation by the people of the United States.

Having that situation in mind, we come to the particular matter before us. For over a generation, during all the time of my residence in the State of Montana, now nearly 40 years, the Indians on that reservation as well as the white people have been looking forward to the development of this power, the Indians expecting to get something out of it and the settlers expecting to utilize it to some extent in the reduction of the construction costs of their project, now growing mountain high. So the whole people of the State have been looking forward to the development of this power, hoping that it will attract industries there where cheap power can be furnished. But capital did not seem to be interested in the matter.

I charged myself, when I came here in 1913, with the duty of securing the enactment of legislation just as speedily as possible so that these great power sites could be developed, but we waited seven years, until 1920, before we obtained any legislation upon the subject, and then that legislation was in force and effect for five years more before anybody came forward with a proposition to develop this particular power site. Finally the Montana Power Co. made the offer which is before us and which is the subject of discussion.

That offer lay upon the shelves of the Water Power Commission for a long time, and no other great power company of the country felt moved to offer a bid. The Byllesby interests, of Chicago, one of the great power combinations of this country, own the electric-light plant at Kalispell, which is at the upper end of Flathead Lake, the power site now under discussion being at the lower end, a distance of perhaps 50 miles away. The Byllesby interests know all about it. Stone & Webster, another great combination, own the power site at Spokane, just over the Montana line. They know all about it, but they are offering nothing in this matter at all. The Montana Power Co. came forward with the proposal we are now considering, and it lay in the files of the Power Commission, as I have said, for some considerable time, when a Mr. Wheeler, of Minneapolis, a consulting engineer, submitted a proposition and then sent out letters, of which the one which I hold in my hand is illustrative. I shall quote from it:

January 9, 1926. Secretary, Commercial Club, Butte, Mont.—

Similar letters were addressed to commercial clubs in nearly all of the cities of western Montana—

DEAR SIR: The undersigned has acquired a lease of the Flathead River power sites in Montana which have a capacity, fully developed, of approximately 175,000 horsepower. With associates we wish to develop these power sites as soon as contracts can be made for the sale of enough of this power at wholesale to warrant development. Do you know of any large users of power, industries present or prospective, public utility companies, municipalities, or others who might be interested in a contract for power at a favorable price? We will be pleased to hear from you at your earliest convenience.

Yours truly,

WALTER H. WHEELER.

Mr. Wheeler has submitted a bid which is a straight offer of $1.50 per kilowatt-hour, which is equivalent to $1.12 or $1.12½ per horsepower, as against the bid of the Montana Power Co. of $1 per horsepower. I hope that Mr. Wheeler will be able to get somebody to give him contracts for power that will enable him to finance his company and that will give the Indians $1.12½ per horsepower for their power rather than a dollar per horsepower. I had hoped that the Byllesby Co. or Stone & Webster or even Mr. Insull and his companies would come in and do better than either of the other bidders.

I have no interest in the Montana Power Co. securing this contract. The Montana Power Co. has never done anything for me; I am under no kind of obligations to the Montana Power Co.; but, so far as I can see, the Montana Power Co. is the only bidder in sight. I said on the reservation, and I say here, that I should like to see some other company come into the State of Montana and give the Montana Power Co. some competition, but there is no prospect of that so far as I can see. I would rather have it developed by the Montana Power Co. than to lie idle; and I wonder what friend of the Indian wants to hold up the development of this power under the conditions that are represented here?

Why, they guaranteed to put in a first unit of 50,000 horsepower and pay a dollar per horsepower. All of it would go to the Indians. Every red cent of it would go to the Indians. So every year that you delay this matter you are robbing the Indians of from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars; and for what? Because, perchance, if you do not try to compose these differences in some such way as is indicated in this measure, next year or the year after or 5 years from now or 10 years from now some one will come along and make a better offer for this power than the Montana Power Co. will.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. Are the Indians themselves raising any particular objection to this project?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad the Senator asked that question. You will notice that in the letter of Mr. Wheeler he says:

The undersigned has acquired a lease on the Flathead River power sites in Montana.

I have here a copy of the lease which he has made with the Flathead Confederated Tribes of Indians. The matter seems to have been taken out of the hands of the Congress. Mr. Wheeler has gone on and dealt directly with the Indians. I do not suppose that the Congress will authorize that; but I have a telegram this morning from Mr. Caville Dupuis. Mr. Dupuis is the president of the Indian council on the Flathead Reservation. He says in this telegram:

If Flathead item on pages 33, 34, and 35 of Interior appropriation bill, which was eliminated by the Senate, is now restored, will this proposition make the lessee of power sites obligated or compelled to give 15,000 horsepower or any other amount to irrigation district or anyone else before permit or lease may issue to it?

I answered:

It does not.

He continues:

And does appropriation for distribution system infer or imply that lessee must give irrigation district or anyone else certain amount of power at cost?

I answered:

It does not.

He continues:

And agree to surrender local market to irrigation district for the resale of such power by them or agree that irrigation district may compete in local market for power?

I answered:

It does not.

So that if these are the objections the Indians have to the matter, it has been woefully misrepresented to the Indians. But perhaps that is not so very strange, because reference has been made to Mr. Collier's interest in this matter.

Mr. Collier is a very high-class gentleman. He is devoted to the cause of the Indians.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He is sincerely attempting to serve their best interests; but he has not an iota of business sense, and this is purely a business proposition, as to whether we had better pass this legislation and allow the development to go on, insuring the Indians from $50,000 to $100,000 a year, or whether we shall hold it up indefinitely and let the matter go on.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have just listened to the reading of the telegram and the categorical replies made by the Senator. I had the impression, from the discussion and from the amendment itself, that the furnishing of the 15,000 horsepower, while it was not free, was at a very, very small price. Would the Senator's answer convey the idea that there was a very small charge, or would it not convey the idea that it was subject to a reasonable charge?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall read it again. The question is:

If Flathead item on pages 33, 34, and 35 of Interior appropriation bill, which was eliminated by the Senate, is now restored, will this proposition make the lessee of power sites obligated or compelled to give 15,000 horsepower or any other amount to irrigation district?

Mr. KING. Does it not, in effect?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not.

Mr. KING. What is the effect of it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The effect of it is, if this legislation is passed, the power is put in the hands of the Water Power Commission, just where it was by virtue of the act of 1920, to let it to whomsoever they see fit to let it——

Mr. SMOOT. To the best bidder.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Without any kind of obligation to lease it to the Montana Power Co. or anybody else, even Mr. Wheeler—not the slightest obligation of any character—and, as I understand, the Senator from Wisconsin does not even contend that there is any obligation of that character.

Mr. KING. Does not the lessee, however, have to furnish to the district 15,000 horsepower at a small cost?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He does not. The Montana Power Co. says, "If you will give us the permit we will do this"; that is all. The Montana Power Co. has not said, "We will agree with you about this." They are at perfect liberty to accept or not to accept the Montana Power Co.'s bid.

Mr. KING. Who would determine what bid should be accepted?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Federal Water Power Commission.

Mr. KING. Not the Indian Bureau?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The bill provides that it must be with the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior, and the original act of 1920 provides that no power site shall be let except with the approval of that department of the Government having control over the particular lands involved.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, there are no impediments to the execution of a contract which would not impose upon the lessee any obligation to furnish the district or the Indians any power below the market or at substantially low prices?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Absolutely none. The Water Power Commission is left perfectly free, as it would be if there were no legislation at all since that of 1920.

Mr. KING. And it may fix such rates as it may see fit to fix for the power which is distributed from the power generated?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is the usual provision of the permit.

Mr. KING. Would there be any obligation upon the part of the power commission of the State, any obligation by Federal statute or by State statute or by any regulations that may be imposed by the Federal Power Commission or the Interior Department, to make a rate here with respect to this power so competitive as to destroy private power companies that are operating in the same field?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Again the Senator is getting away from the Indian feature.

Mr. KING. I grant that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But there is nothing in the bill that affects the situation at all. It leaves it just where the law of 1920 put it. Whatever power they would have under that law they would have if this legislation were enacted.

I spoke about Mr. Collier. I have before me a circular letter which he issued under date of February 6, 1928, which is headed as follows:

The money stake of the Indians in the Flathead power site lease controversy. It is $228,000 a year for 50 years.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is here. Will the Senator kindly give his attention to this:

The money stake of the Indians in the Flathead power site lease * * * is $288,000 a year for 50 years.

Can the Senator from Wisconsin make any explanation of that statement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what statement is it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is a statement issued by Mr. Collier under date of February 6, 1928.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; I do not know what Mr. Collier's authority for that statement is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not suppose anybody else does. Of course I did not expect that the Senator from Wisconsin would indorse this at all. Nothing of this kind has been suggested by anybody on the floor.

Mr. KING. May I venture to suggest a possible basis upon which Mr. Collier reached the conclusion stated by the Senator; namely, he assumes a lease to the power company or some other company under an agreement by the terms of which substantially 15,000 horsepower are to be furnished at a very small cost per annum; that that would mean a loss to the Indians of whatever the rental value of that 15,000 horsepower would be per annum——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But he could not assume that, because under the Montana Power Co.'s proposition, they must pay a dollar a year for it to the Indians.

Mr. KING. For the 15,000 horsepower?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly; of course. Now, bear in mind, the only loss claimed by the Senator from Wisconsin and by those who have given any thought at all to the subject is that because the Montana Power Co. has agreed to furnish to the project 15,000 horsepower at a low rate, if it did not have to do that it could offer more than a dollar per horsepower for it.

Mr. KING. Yes; probably $1.17 and a fraction or more per horsepower.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Wheeler is offering only $1.12, and, bear in mind, assuming no such obligation.

Mr. KING. And assuming that the horsepower which may be developed is two or three hundred thousand——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. One hundred and seventy-five thousand at the utmost.

Mr. KING. Then, I suppose Mr. Collier bases his figures upon the assumption of the loss of the rental upon the 15,000 horsepower for a period of 15 years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, even so, if you figure that 17 cents per horsepower would be a fair price without furnishing the 15,000 at the low rate, you then have only seventeen one-hundredths of $175,000 per year. Take the biggest figure that you have; you have only seventeen one-hundredths of $175,000, as against $238,000 a year, the public are told by this circular which has thus gone out.

Now, we get back to the very question that is at issue here. Shall we allow this thing to go on, and allow the contest over this matter between the settlers and the Indians to continue indefinitely, meaning a loss to the Indians of from fifty to one-hundred thousand dollars a year, or shall we pass this legislation, adjusting this controversy and disposing of it, even though the Indians do not get as much as in justice they ought to have if the development were to go right on now? But I say here, as I said before, that the loss which ensues to the Indians from any delay in the development of this power site can never be made up by any possibility, in my judgment, by any increased price in the horsepower charge that will be exacted of any permittee taking this permit.

Mr. President, I do not believe that anybody is going to accuse anybody connected with this matter of any desire to do any wrong to these Indians. I believe that we are all trying to subserve their interests; and I am confident that their interests demand that we get rid of the legislation of 1926 and 1927 which stands in the way of the development of this project, and that it is accomplished by this legislation without any real, substantial loss to the Indians. Accordingly, I hope that the conference report will be approved.

I shall be very glad to answer any questions and give the Senate any further information that I can.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would like to say to the Senator from Montana that I thank him for this illuminating discussion to-day. I think he will agree that Mr. Collier and other friends of the Indians have difficulty in getting the ins and outs and all the minutiæ of a problem of this sort. There is a contention on the part of many very good persons in this country that sometimes Congress is careless in passing upon these measures which have to do with the rights of the Indians.

So far as I am concerned, I am entirely satisfied, and I thank the Senator for his patience in explaining the matter in detail. I desire to withdraw any objection I had to the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. GARNER of Texas, and Mr. COLLIER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 1154. An act to authorize the use by the county of Yuma, Ariz., of certain public lands for a municipal aviation field, and for other purposes;

S. 1193. An act granting certain rocks or islands to the State of Oregon for park purposes;

S. 1312. An act to change the name of the Utah National Park, the establishment of which is provided for by the act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 593), to the "Bryce Canyon National Park," and for other purposes;

S. 1425. An act to remove a cloud on title; and

S. 1959. An act to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction over oil and gas leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior on lands in naval petroleum reserves.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1759) to appropriate treaty funds due the Wisconsin Pottawatomi Indians, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 81. An act to authorize the coinage of silver 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of the Hawaiian Islands by Capt. James Cook, and for the purpose of aiding in establishing a Capt. James Cook memorial collection in the archives of the Territory of Hawaii;

H. R. 132. An act authorizing the erection of a sanitary fireproof hospital at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Dayton, Ohio;

H. R. 142. An act to add certain lands to the Idaho National Forest, Idaho;

H. R. 144. An act to add certain lands to the Challis and Sawtooth National Forests, Idaho;

H. R. 158. An act to amend chapter 137 of volume 39 of the United States Statutes at Large, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session;

H. R. 173. An act to provide funds for the upkeep of the Puyallup Indian Cemetery at Tacoma, Wash.;

H. R. 235. An act to authorize the payment of travel expenses from appropriations for investigations and surveys of battle fields;

H. R. 238. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct," approved December 17, 1919, so as to include nurses of the Regular Army;

H. R. 308. An act authorizing an appropriation for the survey and investigation of the placing of water on the Michaud division and other lands in the Fort Hall Indian Reservation;

H. R. 356. An act to amend section 2 of the act of March 3, 1905, entitled "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians residing on the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in the State of Wyoming, and to make appropriations to carry the same into effect";

H. R. 5476. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. a tract of land situate in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania;

H. R. 5494. An act to enable the mothers and unmarried widows of the deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American forces interred in the cemeteries of Europe to make a pilgrimage to these cemeteries;

H. R. 5545. An act granting certain lands to the State of California;

H. R. 5635. An act to amend the act approved June 7, 1924, authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Carlisle Barracks Reservation;

H. R. 5687. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain public lands to the Cabazon Water Co., issue patent therefor, and for other purposes;

H. R. 5695. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to equitably adjust disputes and claims of settlers and others against the United States and between each other arising from incomplete or faulty surveys in township 19 south, range 26 east, Tallahassee meridian, Lake County, in the State of Florida;

H. R. 6056. An act to provide for addition of certain land to the Challis National Forest;

H. R. 6652. An act to fix the pay and allowances of chaplain at the United States Military Academy;

H. R. 7008. An act to authorize appropriations for the completion of the transfer of the experimental and testing plant of the Air Corps to a permanent site at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7213. An act to grant authority to the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for the transportation of mails by air to foreign countries and insular possessions of the United States for periods of not more than 10 years, and to pay for such service from the appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails at fixed rates per pound or per mile, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7908. An act to authorize the granting of leave to ex-service men and women to attend the annual convention of the United Spanish War Veterans and auxiliary in Habana, Cuba, in 1928;

H. R. 10487. An act to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended;

H. J. Res. 141. Joint resolution to authorize the President to invite the Government of Great Britain to participate in the celebration of the sesquicentennial of the discovery of the Hawaiian Islands, and to provide for the participation of the Government of the United States therein; and

H. J. Res. 176. Joint resolution granting consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of Wisconsin and the State of Michigan for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a highway bridge across the Menominee River.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees upon the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. GERRY conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask to be excused from service on this conference committee, and that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is a member of the Finance Committee, be designated in my stead.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to excusing the Senator from North Carolina from service as a conferee on the part of the Senate? The Chair hears none. The Senator from North Carolina is excused, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in his stead.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 10487. An act to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended; to the Committee on Finance.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10635 making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the unanimous-consent request is granted, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he has conferred with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. WARREN. I have; and have an arrangement by which we may proceed with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendment to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of this appropriation bill will not disturb the position of the measure which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has in charge. Without objection, the formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with and the bill will be read for action on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, owing to the peculiar situation with regard to this bill, I think I ought to state, before proceeding further, that after the bill, which appropriates all together a billion sixty-odd million dollars, came to the Senate from the House, both departments, and all those to whom we usually refer for information, were asked to examine the bill and to come before the committee if anything further was needed. The officials of both departments and of all branches of the departments expressed satisfaction, as the bill had given them as much as they had a right to expect, though not as much, perhaps, as they had originally asked for. Nobody came before the committee who wished to present something new except two parties. As a result of their appearance $36,000 is added in one place, and when that item is reached I will present a little amendment of language which I have been instructed by the committee to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill for action on the committee amendment.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I observe that the Senate committee has made an amendment to the bill which adds the amount of $36,000. The total carried in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives is $1,061,342,060. Of course, that is a very large appropriation. The amount added by the Senate committee, however, appears to be very small. I think it would conserve the convenience of the Senate, and perhaps save time in the consideration of the bill, if the Senator from Wyoming would take the trouble now to explain the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this bill came from the House carrying $1,061,342,060. The amount added by the Senate committee is $36,000, as I have stated. The amount carried by this bill is higher than that in the bill of last year, higher than the appropriations for these departments have ever been before, because of the authorization for the construction of some 70 public buildings, the construction of which has been authorized by law. The items have been properly considered and were estimated for. The bill falls short of the estimates for 1929 by $8,182,200.

Comparing the appropriations for 1928 and 1929, those for the Treasury are $365,037.56 less than we appropriated last year for that department.

In the Post Office bill we are under the estimates for 1929 by $3,064,000. As I stated before, we are eight million and something under the Budget estimates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the item added by the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. I shall be glad to explain it. There came before us a proposition, in the first place, to rent from an institution certain machines for the sale of stamps, where you put in a nickel and draw out two stamps. They have rented this machine to certain postmasters in certain post offices in the United States, charging them, I think, some large amount per annum. Of course the Government receives compensation for every stamp. When a nickel is placed in the machine and two stamps come out, the difference of 1 cent, or if it is a larger purchase, whatever small change may be over, is divided. They wished us to rent a hundred machines and pay $360 apiece for them, to be put into different post offices, the locations to be selected, of course, by the Postmaster General. That was objected to, and later on we received word that they would sell them to the United States for $360 apiece, greatly below the cost.

Mr. SMOOT. This is for the purchase, instead of the leasing?

Mr. WARREN. I might say, in passing, that the distinguished Senator who is always in close touch with these matters, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], was present at the time of the first consideration of the proposal, and later on, when the proposition came to sell those to the United States, he had already expressed his approval. The subcommittee almost unanimously adopted the idea of investing $36,000 in these vending machines, claiming that they were a help in the matter of time, the clerks in the offices being relieved of the necessity of waiting upon customers, a customer simply pushing a button and getting his stamps. Of course, this contemplates obtaining later a different line of machinery, larger and capable of use in the sale of more varieties of stamps. That is all I can say about it. I have not seen the machines.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question in the time of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is observed that the item is as follows:

> Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General: Canceling machines and labor-saving devices, automatic postage service machines, $36,000.

What disposition is to be made of this $36,000 fund?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I say a word first? I hold in my hand an amendment which I was authorized by the committee to offer: On page 79, line 17, after the word "devices," to insert the words "purchase and repair of automatic postage-service machines."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator in answer to his inquiry that if the bill passes, the Government of the United States will own 100 of the automatic machines. They will be placed in such offices as the New York Post Office. I will say also that for the last year they have been in such offices and have been thoroughly tested. In New York alone I think the average receipts from one of the machines were approximately $500 a day. On some days, such as Saturdays and special days, the receipts have run as high as $700.

The machines are placed in post offices such I have mentioned, and do not require the services of a clerk. A machine of that sort in a post office like New York releases the service of at least one clerk every day for other purposes. All a customer has to do is to drop in his nickel, and he will get two 2-cent stamps and one 1-cent stamp. Public machines of this character are used all over the United States now, but where they are owned by the manufacturer the customer is required to pay 5 cents for two 2-cent stamps. If he wants merely one 1-cent stamp, it costs him 2 cents to get it.

The machines which will be manufactured for the Government of the United States will be so arranged that a customer can purchase a 1-cent stamp for 1 cent, a 2-cent stamp for 2 cents, and so on. Each machine will contain five denominations of stamps. All a man will have to do is to step into the post office, drop his money in the machine, and get its equivalent in postage stamps. They do not lose any money on the purchase at all. They pay 2 cents for a 2-cent stamp. If they drop a nickel in the machine they get two 2-cent stamps and one 1-cent stamp. The saving to the Government in clerk hire will be probably a million dollars a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The machine would probably pay for itself in one of the larger post offices within a short time?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; within less than a year.

Mr. WARREN. That is the claim of those who presented the matter. The Senator from Utah has seen the machine and I have not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was the statement of the chairman of the committee that prompted me to ask the Senator from Utah the question.

Mr. SMOOT. In Chicago, Indianapolis, and similar cities they have these machines and they have been given a very thorough test.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before we leave this item I want to ask my colleague a question. These machines, it seems to me, are an experiment, and I was wondering if there is any purpose to purchase any great number of them?

Mr. SMOOT. Just 100 of them that we already have. We are to pay $360 apiece for them, which is the amount the manufacturer wanted for leasing them per year. We objected to that, and so we will buy 100 of them, which we have already got located in various post offices. It is no experiment so far as the public is concerned. The only possible chance of any error will be whether the very men who have perfected the machine to sell stamps of 1 and 2 cent denominations and charge a profit on them can make the machines to sell two 2-cents stamps for 4 cents, and so on. It is only necessary to make a change in the mechanism. It will cost no more to obtain stamps from these machines, so far as the public is concerned, than to buy them directly from a post-office clerk at the present time. We have letters from the department and from the Postmaster General urging the purchase of the machines.

When the time arrived for the experiments and we had tested the machines and undertook to take them out, we had letters of protest from every place where they had been on trial, as well as from the Postmaster General, saying what it meant to the Government of the United States and to the people who purchase stamps. I think it is one of the best modern devices and will save a great deal to the Government of the United States.

Mr. KING. Of course, I shall not object to the purchase of the machines, but it seems to me that the cost is enormous for such machines. There are many other machines the mechanism of which is far more complicated and the size of which is far greater which are sold for much less than the figure indicated here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the clerk has not yet reached the amendment which we have been discussing, but was merely giving us the totals in the preceding part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, on page 79, line 20, after the words "traveling expenses," to strike out "$700,000" and insert "$736,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For rental, purchase, exchange, and repair of canceling machines and motors, mechanical mail-handling apparatus, and other labor-saving devices, including cost of power in rented buildings and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation of same, including salaries of seven traveling mechanicians and for traveling expenses, $736,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 79, line 17, after the word "devices," to insert "purchase and repair of automatic postage-service machines," so as to read:

For rental, purchase, exchange, and repair of canceling machines and motors, mechanical mail-handling apparatus, and other labor-saving devices, purchase and repair of automatic postage-service machines, including cost of power in rented buildings and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation of same, including salaries of seven traveling mechanicians and for traveling expenses, $736,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. How much is the amount appropriated for public buildings and construction?

Mr. WARREN. We have not computed separately the amount appropriated for public buildings and construction, because there are several items under which those amounts are appropriated for different kinds of buildings. In each case we state what the total amount of the contract shall be, and then the appropriation is made for the fiscal year only.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the committee give consideration to increasing the number of buildings or the appropriations so that we might have some employment of the unemployed?

Mr. WARREN. The number of buildings that we have provided for is so large that one could hardly question that we had gone as far as it was safe to go in the matter of appropriations at this time. It should give employment to a large number of men.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this bill we carry the limit of appropriation that was authorized by the bill which authorized the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the construction of public buildings throughout the United States. As I said yesterday, there was $100,000,000 more authorized, but the buildings provided for under the terms of the pending bill are the ones that have been agreed upon to be paid for out of the first $100,000,000 authorized to be appropriated.

Mr. COPELAND. Was the amount appropriated in each instance justified?

Mr. WARREN. I can answer the Senator now as to the total amount appropriated. The total is just a few dollars less than $19,000,000 for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year.

Mr. COPELAND. Is that the limit of appropriations that can be made under the law?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; it is only the proportion for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the limit that could be appropriated for the one year under the law. Twenty million dollars is the limit that can possibly be appropriated out of the $100,000,000 authorized.

Mr. COPELAND. The thing I have in mind is that there is an increasing amount of unemployment in the country. That is particularly true of skilled laborers and artisans. I think it is clearly the duty of the Government at this time to make the appropriations as generous as possible and to make sure in the legislation that there shall be no delay in beginning construction. It is apparent we are going to have through the United States in the next few months more and more of an accumulation of unemployed people, and every dollar that we can put into this sort of work will mean the lessening of suffering and distress in America.

Mr. SMOOT. After the statement made by the Senator from New York yesterday I went to the department to find out about unemployment in the United States. It has been extremely difficult to say just exactly what it is during the present month. I was delighted to learn that the prospects for building in the United States for the year 1928 are even better and greater than in 1927. The building program will begin just as soon as winter breaks. For instance, there are three great buildings to be erected in Pittsburgh. One of them will be nearly 40 stories high, costing tens of millions of dollars. Another will be 32 stories high, one of the most beautiful buildings which I have ever seen if I may judge from the architect's drawings. I was very much pleased, indeed, to learn of the prospects that are ahead of us just as soon as winter breaks.

I was also told of numerous buildings to be erected in New York and different cities in the United States. I think that when the cold weather breaks we will find that all of the men now out of employment, classed as skilled labor, will be very well employed. I sincerely hope so, as I know the Senator from New York does.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said. I hope he is right. Of course, when I read the report made by the industrial commissioner of my State, it was very disturbing to find statements like this:

> Sixth Avenue agencies for hotel and restaurant workers report a stream of applicants in and out all day long with no available jobs. A great many of them are from outside of New York City. Men will take jobs at any wages.

Then further it is said:

> Six up-State cities, with a total population of 1,258,000, are declared to have between 65,000 and 70,000 persons out of work. Evidently a further decline of employment is indicated. Buffalo, with a population of 538,000, has about 35,000 to 40,000 unemployed.

Those are very serious statements.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of those facts. I went back into the reports of a few years ago and if the Senator will look at them too he will find that in the months of January and February of each year there is always a shortage of employment. It has been true in the past and no doubt will be true in the future. But there is every indication at the present time that just as soon as the weather breaks so that building operations can begin, we are going to have a good building year in the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to hear the Senator say that, but here is the report of Commissioner Hamilton, of the State industrial commission of New York State, just made this week, in which he said:

> Letters received each month in the building department of 23 cities of New York State, as to building permits issued, indicate a decrease in the estimated cost of such building work of 13 per cent.

So it will be seen that we have a very serious situation with which to deal, and we must find some way to solve the problem. I hope the committee has put into the bill a provision for all the buildings which we are justified in constructing, because certainly unemployment conditions demand that the Federal Government shall do its full part.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows there is now authorized $200,000,000 for buildings outside of the District of Columbia. That is a 10-year program. The present bill carries just a little less than the $20,000,000 which we are authorized to appropriate for the fiscal year. The Senator can be assured that, so far as the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate are concerned, they have gone to the very limit under the law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I notice on page 33 an item for the prevention of epidemics, $400,000. Is that an increase over the current arrangement?

Mr. WARREN. It is exactly the same in amount. We shall no doubt have next year, as we have always had in the past, an additional amount to be covered in the deficiency appropriation bill for whatever has been made necessary in connection with any unusual demand. Such a practice has always prevailed in the past. It relates to epidemics in the human family as well as in the animal kingdom, for such diseases among animals, for instance, as the foot-and-mouth disease. We have appropriated here an amount which is considered to be the average amount required for the purpose. Then the department will proceed with that amount and expend whatever is necessary and we will cover in a deficiency appropriation bill whatever additional amount has been found to have been required.

Mr. COPELAND. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I have introduced a bill in this Congress to increase this amount to $1,000,000. The reason why I did it was because it was very disturbing to those of us who have some interest in public health to find, after the Mississippi flood, that the Public Health Service was without funds to deal with the situation.

They had finally to borrow here and there to obtain $35,000 in order to deal with the situation. We have in the charter of the city of New York a clause called the "imminent peril" clause. In case of imminent peril to the public health under certain conditions, where the mayor and the board of health agree, a very large sum of money is placed at the disposal of the board of health to take care of situations of this kind. We ought to have a sum available for the United States Public Health Service. The chances are it would not be called upon; it might not be called upon in 50 years, but, on the other hand, there might come a time when Congress was not in session when it would be very necessary to have a large sum of money available.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that what he suggests has happened once or twice. The department in those instances expended the money that was absolutely necessary and then came to Congress to provide a deficiency appropriation. I think that happened last year.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, such cases are not uncommon.

Mr. SMOOT. They frequently arise.

Mr. WARREN. Formerly to take care of emergencies incident to great forest fires we appropriated as much as $25,000, but now we appropriate nothing of any consequence for that purpose in advance. But the Forest Service officials and employees understand that they are permitted to perform the duty and act immediately in arresting a great conflagration, and the Government always covers the matter with later appropriations for items allowed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is a good thing to have a record of this matter; and I want the RECORD to show that I have been assured by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on Finance if necessity shall arise the Public Health Service will be fully justified in making whatever expenditure may be needed for the protection of the public health, and that the expenditure will be taken care of in a deficiency bill at the ensuing session of Congress. Am I right in that?

Mr. WARREN. So far as the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, I do not like to commit myself to the proposition as broadly as the Senator states it, but any amount that, in the judgment of the Senator from New York or any other eminent surgeon or physician, might be necessary, I have no doubt would be at once furnished.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. KING. I thought the Senator from New York had the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Just one moment. Now, what does the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], have to say to my proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire to say is that we shall follow the example which we have followed in the past, and whenever in any national emergency money shall be expended over and above the regular appropriation a deficiency appropriation bill will provide for the expenditure at the very first opportunity.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad to hear the Senator's statement, but I wish to make certain that in case of necessity the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service—and I assume that he would consult the President in such an event—will be justified in incurring an almost unlimited expenditure.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator from New York that I summoned the Surgeon General to come before our committee and to state whether he thought it necessary to increase this amount at this time, or to make any other suggestions as to any other necessary items of appropriation which he thought should be included in the bill. He thanked me for the liberality with which his department had been treated, and seemed perfectly satisfied with the appropriations now provided.

Mr. COPELAND. Sometimes individual officers are modest. The only kind of a man who should be a public health officer is a red-blooded, two-fisted brute, and it is necessary to have him clothed with authority to be used in case of necessity.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator have such an officer sufficiently red blooded to kill instead of cure?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; when it comes to dealing with the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I accept the amendment of the Senator from New York when it comes to that.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; but the RECORD shows, I think, that the authorities represented by the chairmen of these two powerful committees agree that in case of necessity the Public Health Service will be justified in making whatever expenditures shall be necessary for the protection of the public health.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] if he is seeking to have the States absolve themselves from their responsibility in caring for the public health of their inhabitants? Does he wish to devolve the whole duty upon the Federal Government of providing for the health of the people? The trouble has been that some officials and many persons within the States, when local epidemics or localized maladies appear—which ought to be cared for by local agencies or by the States—rush frantically to the Federal Government for aid, as is done in so many other matters relating to the social, industrial, and economic welfare of the people. They insist that the General Government shall take over the duties of local communities and States, and bear the expenses which should be met by such communities or States. This policy is wrong. It weakens the people and enslaves the States, and gives strength to the centralizing movements which, if continued, will destroy the States.

I assume that the Senator from New York, being a Democrat, believes that local communities and States should discharge their responsibilities. I assume that he is not attempting to commit the chairmen of these two committees or the Senate—and, of course, he could not commit either—to the proposition that the Federal Government is to take over the burdens and responsibilities of the States. In my opinion, Senators could perform important service to the people by constantly affirming the doctrine of State rights and State duties, and resisting the demands for Federal interposition in their domestic and internal affairs, which, under our dual form of government, appertain to the States or to the people therein. I think that we could do a great service to the public if we would constantly keep in mind the fact that there are responsibilities which the States may not and can not and should not shirk, but which, if they do shirk, the Federal Government, with its itching hand for power, will reach out and take over.

So I want to commit the Senator from New York, if I may, to the proposition that he believes in State rights, and I want to commit him to the proposition that the great State of New York and the city of New York will assume the responsibilities which rest upon them to care for the public health of the inhabitants of the city of New York and of the State of New York, and, so far as he has the authority, to pledge his State and his muncipality to that obvious duty, I should be very happy to have him make that pledge now. I am not in any manner indicating that the State of New York or the city of New York has been derelict in the performance of its duties in respect of the matters referred to. Upon the contrary, so far as I am advised, both have been diligent in asserting their rights and discharging their duties.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I find myself in almost complete accord with the Senator from Utah, as I usually do. There is no doubt that in these contingencies the State must do its full duty. I have sent for the bill I introduced. I want to show to the Senator from Utah that I anticipated comment like his. In the measure which I presented and had referred to the Appropriations Committee it was provided that the work should be done in cooperation with the States.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of what I am talking about. After the war we had a fear in New York of an epidemic of typhus. As a matter of fact, the board of health of New York City discovered cases of typhus in the city. At that time the Presidente Wilson, a vessel of the Cosulich Line, was tied up at the dock in Brooklyn and her passengers were being discharged and were about to be dispersed through the city and the country when we discovered that cases of typhus had come in on that boat. We sent the passengers back on board the boat and the boat back to quarantine. A number of cases of typhus, which is one of the most deadly diseases known to man, were found on that boat, and a number of those afflicted died in our harbor.

Of course, that was a very distressing thing. I called on the Public Health Service to improve the conditions at quarantine in order that we might be protected. To my astonishment I found that they were so hampered for lack of funds that they were unable to do the things necessary to protect the country. Then, as commissioner of health of the city of New York, I offered the Surgeon General the clerk and the doctors and the nurses and the other personnel necessary to protect the country. The city of New York and the State of New York were willing to do their share of taking care of the country at large; but our offer was refused.

Then some of us came to Washington. I myself went before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, where I made no progress until I told the chairman, who came from the State of Iowa, that if we did not make the appropriation to take care of the country Iowa might be infected. Then immediately he said, "My Heavens, if Iowa is in danger we must make the appropriation at once." And it was done.

As a matter of fact, there are times when the Federal Government is helpless and when the States must do their part, but it is not right there should be any question of power or of money when there is a threatened epidemic of disease. That is the reason why I have ventured to take any of the time of the Senate to-day—to impress upon the Senate the necessity of having available funds which in time of public necessity may be used for the protection of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the bill under consideration calls for more than $1,000,000,000, and it provides for but two departments of the Government This measure means that the United States will spend considerably more than $1,000,000,000 in the next fiscal year for the ordinary expenses of the Treasury and Post Office Departments. This huge sum is more than the entire amount expended by the Government in the years 1915 or 1916. It means that the national expenditures are mounting higher and higher, and that for the fiscal year 1929 the Government will spend directly and indirectly at least $5,000,000,000. In my opinion we can not afford such stupendous expenditures. It means that the National Government is creating new bureaus and agencies and multiplying the personnel. It means that there is but slight chance for tax reduction, but, on the contrary, indicates that for the fiscal year 1930, if the present policies of the Government are continued, there will be an imperative need for additional tax burdens.

I submit that it is time to call a halt; to stop and minutely examine the costs of Government, and determine whether prudence and sanity and economy are characterizing governmental policies. There is much talk of economy, and many persons indulge in the sweet delusion that the Federal Government is being economically administered.

A comparison of the appropriations made by Congress for the present fiscal year and those which it is certain will be made for the next fiscal year, with the Federal expenditures for the years preceding the World War, will show how far we have traveled along the highway of national extravagance.

Mr. President, the Federal Government is attempting too much, and is assuming responsibilities which are not within its authority or competency.

The lines dividing the States from the Federal Government are being obliterated; and with increasing momentum the latter is marching upon the unresisting citadels of State sovereignty. The results are not difficult to forecast—if there shall be no awakening of the people to the menace of centralization.

Concentration of power and authority always exact high taxes and increasing revenues. Rome exploited her provinces and crushed them with tax burdens.

History has but few pages; indeed, Lord Byron says that "History, with all her volumes, hath but one page." The American people are too complaisant; they are too indifferent to the lessons of history and the deadly parallels that the pages of history present. The General Government is already becoming topheavy; it is demoralizing the States, enervating the people, and drawing to itself forces and influences and power that constitute a menace to the liberty and jeopardize constitutional Government.

We appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars within a few minutes and with no discussion.

The bill before us, carrying, as I have said, considerably more than a billion dollars, will, I feel sure, be passed within a few minutes after I shall have resumed my seat.

In my opinion the sum carried in the bill is too great, and I shall ask for a reduction. I know what the result will be. There will be no reduction, and before this Congress finally adjourns deficiency measures will be enacted into law appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars.

I invite Senators' attention to a few items under the head of "Internal revenue," page 17, line 19, of the bill. This provision calls for $32,667,750 as expenses for assessing and collecting internal-revenue taxes for the coming fiscal year.

I desire to present some figures which will show the increased cost of collection of internal-revenue taxes during the past few years.

In 1917 the cost of collecting the internal-revenue taxes was $7,699,031, or 95 cents for each $100 collected.

In 1918, during the period of the war, the internal-revenue taxes collected were greater, amounting to $3,698,955,822, but the cost of collection was but 33 cents per $100, the total being $12,003,214.

Senators will perceive that in that year, when the internal-revenue taxes were approximately $1,000,000,000 more than will be collected for the next fiscal year, the cost of collection was but $12,000,000, while this bill demands $32,967,764, or $1.15 for each $100 collected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I presume the Senator has before him the table which I have in my hand and he is considering the expenditures and not the receipts. If he will take the other column showing receipts, he will find different figures, I think.

Mr. KING. The Senator is entirely in error. I am quoting the figures appearing in the hearings of the Appropriations Committee of the House on the Treasury Department appropriation bill for 1929, found on page 301.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator endeavoring to prove? I might read some figures.

Mr. KING. I am proving that the cost of administration is too great. I have called attention to the fact that in this bill the appropriation——

Mr. WARREN. Which is smaller than the appropriation for last year and smaller than for a number of years preceding.

Mr. KING. The bill provides an appropriation of $32,667,750 for collecting less revenue than was collected last year.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me see if I am correct. The Senator was stating the cost per hundred dollars or per dollar for collecting the revenue?

Mr. KING. I am stating both. I am stating the receipts, the aggregate cost of collecting the internal revenue and the cost per dollar, for a number of years last past. If the Senator will permit me to conclude——

Mr. WARREN. All right. I do not know what figures the Senator has. Here are the official figures, and they do not agree with the Senator's figures.

Mr. KING. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I have not presented all the figures for the current or next fiscal year. I have been quoting the figures of a number of preceding years.

The figures presented are from the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations during the present session of Congress.

In 1919 the total internal revenue receipts was $3,850,150,078.56 and the costs of collecting the same were $20,573,771.52, or 53 cents per $100.

So that when our revenues from internal-revenue sources were approximately double what they will be for the next fiscal year it cost only 53 cents per $100 to collect the same, or an aggregate of $20,573,771.52; and yet we are asked to appropriate this year $32,667,750, though, as stated, the amount collected will be perhaps between 50 and 60 per cent of the amount of the collections in 1919.

In 1920 the tax collections were $5,407,580,251.81 and the cost of collecting the same $27,037,134.50, or 50 cents for every $100 collected.

In 1921 the collections were $4,595,357,061.95 and the expenditures were $33,174,309.17, or 72 cents per $100 collected.

In 1922 the collections were $3,197,451,083, at a cost of $34,286,651.42, or $1.07 per $100 collected. The cost of collection jumped from 33 cents in 1918 to $1.07 in 1922 per $100. I make no comment on the fact that there was a change in administration. The figures speak for themselves. It will also be remembered that the new revenue system was devised and put into operation during the war. It called for excess-profits taxes, heavy internal-revenue taxes, a great variety of excise taxes. Yet under this new system and the vast revenue collected, the costs of collection were from 33 cents to 50 cents per $100 collected as against $1.44 per $100 for the year 1925, as I shall point out.

In 1923 the receipts were $2,621,745,227.57 and the cost of collection was the enormous sum of $36,501,062.94, or $1.39 cost for every $100 collected.

The following year, 1924, the receipts were $2,796,179,257.06 and the cost of collection was $34,676,688.11, or $1.24 for every $100 collected.

In 1925 the receipts were $2,584,140,268.24 and the expenses incident to the collection of the same were $37,266,573.16, or $1.44 per $100 collected.

In 1926 the receipts were $2,835,999,892.19 and the collection expenses were $34,948,483.37, or $1.23 per $100 collected.

In 1927 the receipts were $2,865,683,129.91, at a cost of $32,967,764.17, or $1.15 for each $100 collected.

As I have indicated, when the amount of the receipts was $5,407,000,000 plus in 1920, the cost of collection was only 50 cents on every $100. For 1927 the cost was $1.15. I do not know what the cost this year will be, because the amount of revenue collected and to be collected is not shown in the report; but the total expenses of collection is $32,667,750, and it is safe to say that the cost will be approximately the same as for the present fiscal year.

I can not comprehend why the expenses incurred in collecting these taxes since 1920 is so great. In my opinion there should have been a reduction in cost and a diminution in the number of employees since that year. There are several reasons why such should have been the case. The principal one is that the amount collected each year has been much less than in 1919 and 1920. An additional reason is that various taxes have been abolished, and several million persons have been relieved of the duty of making returns, thus relieving the work of the employees in this bureau. Moreover the tax laws, with the repeal of various taxes, have been simplified. Many obscure questions have been settled; the procedure is better known, and the employees are supposed, with the years of experience, to be more competent. But notwithstanding these cojent reasons, calling for greatly reduced costs of collection, there has been no satisfactory record in this direction, and the bill before us gives no promise of any improvement for the next fiscal year.

Mr. President, this item of more than $32,000,000 is too great, and I shall submit a motion to reduce the same.

The bill also allows the Treasury Department $1,082,000, as found on page 15, for the office of the Treasurer of the United States for personal services in his particular office, differentiating that from the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Then $305,000 is carried for further service in the Treasury Department in connection with the redemption of Federal reserve and national currency.

There is a further appropriation of $325,000 for the Comptroller of the Currency.

For personal services in the District of Columbia in connection with Federal reserve and national currency, $48,960 is appropriated.

Then comes the item, to which I have called attention, of $32,667,750.

In addition to these amounts, there is allowed as salaries for the Customs Service $18,940,000, and on the next page various amounts for other expenses in the divisions of the Treasury Department, the aggregate being several million dollars.

I call attention, though it is not germane to what I am saying now, to the fact that on page 19 is $130,000,000 for refund of taxes.

Then we come to the Bureau of Prohibition, which receives many millions of dollars.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the Senator gets away from the item of refund of $130,000,000; is there any explanation of that? Is any reason given why this amount was refunded? Is any information given to the Senate that will enable us intelligently to vote such a sum as that?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are others who are members of the Appropriations Committee who doubtless will make an explanation. However, I have some familiarity with this matter and know that tens of millions of dollars will be refunded to corporations and individuals. There have been refunds of taxes aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars, and in adjusting the taxes of corporations particularly, there will be ordered returned to them many millions of dollars additional. These refunds draw 5 per cent interest, so that it is wise to make an appropriation to pay the ordered refunds after we know all the facts and are fully advised as to the justice of such directions.

As to the persons or corporations who will obtain these refunds aggregating such a large amount, of course, no one can tell, because those matters are being adjudged from day to day in the Internal Revenue Department. The names of all persons and corporations who will receive refunds are not now known to the officials of the Treasury Department, as their cases have not been fully reviewed. When ascertained, Congress should be advised and the amount to be returned to each person and corporation should likewise be supplied.

It is possible they might furnish the names of a few, but it would be impossible until the claims have been passed upon by the officials in the department charged with that responsibility to name to the Senate the corporations or individuals who will be the beneficiaries of this suggested appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. This is just an estimate.

Mr. KING. This is an estimate. It may not amount to $130,000,000 and it may exceed it. My opinion is that we will have deficiency appropriations which will call for more than $130,000,000, and before we adjourn, or when we meet next December, we will be called upon to make a further appropriation to supplement the $130,000,000 carried in this item.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment so that I may respond to the statement of the Senator from Utah in one particular?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I simply want to say with respect to it, that I am going to put into the RECORD the figures showing what it has cost each year per $100 from 1913 to 1927, inclusive. I ask leave to print the figures in the RECORD, without further remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fiscal year	Receipts	Expenditures	Cost per $100
1913	$344, 424, 453. 85	$5, 484, 654. 61	$1. 59

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish merely to make a brief statement, so that there will be no mistake as to the appropriation for this purpose. In 1920 the receipts were $5,407,000,000. In 1922 the receipts were but $3,197,000,000.

Mr. KING. Those are the same figures I gave.

Mr. SMOOT. Just the same. The figures the Senator gave are absolutely correct. I want the Senate to know why the cost per hundred, or per thousand, for collecting the taxes, differs so greatly in the years mentioned.

In the year 1920 the receipts were $5,407,000,000. After the passage of the 1920 revenue act the receipts were only $3,197,000,000. There were just as many returns made, and it took the employees of the department just as many hours to examine those returns as it did when the rates were higher. There was just as much work after the passage of the 1921 act as there was after the passage of the 1918 act. It took just the same number of employees, the returns had to be figured in exactly the same way, and therefore the cost was approximately the same. Comparing the cost when the returns amounted to $5,400,000,000 with the costs when the returns amounted to $3,400,000,000 we find that they are higher on the $3,400,000,000 returns, per $100 or $1,000, than on the returns of $5,400,000,000. That is how the figures showing the cost of collecting the taxes of our country differing during the years mentioned are accounted for.

Of course, the appropriation for this purpose for the last few years has been steady. In fact, this appropriation is a little less than it was last year. As long as we have such a number of reports made, and it is required by law that everyone of the income-tax returns shall be examined by some employee of the Internal Revenue Bureau, we must have a sufficient number of people to handle them within a given time. That is why the percentages are higher, I will say to my colleague.

There could be no excuse for an increase in the appropriations, unless some unforeseen condition had arisen, but in this case, of course, the appropriation is a little less than it was last year. I am glad to say the number of disputed claims is growing smaller, and I want to express the opinion that I believe now the $130,000,000 is going to meet the refunds; they are getting less in number every year, and, strange to say, most of them refer back to the time when we had the excess-profits tax and there was hardly a single lawyer or taxpayer who could make out his tax return under that most difficult law. I am not criticizing the passage of the law. It was passed in war times. It was framed hastily. We had to raise billions of dollars, and the law was framed in the very best way possible, with the best advice we could get.

When the law went into effect in 1917, when we went into the war, none of us knew anything about what a tax return was. We had had no such law in the United States. It was new to everybody. There were no attorneys who had ever studied it. I dare say that right now there is hardly a Senator or a Member of the House who could make out his return under the tax law of 1917. No wonder there were mistakes, and no wonder so many unsettled cases have been dragging on so long. I hope to see the time come shortly when we will all know how to make out a tax return, and it will be simple.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield for just one remark?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The junior Senator from Utah alluded to higher allowances to the Internal Revenue Bureau this last year in one item. That is due to the fact that portions of the Internal Revenue Service moved out of a tumble-down building into the new Press Building. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this manner of transacting the public business ought to be condemned and it ought to be abandoned. The idea of the Senate, representing the people of the United States, voting to appropriate $130,000,000 without a scintilla of testimony from anybody justifying such action! I do not intend to vote for any of these appropriations until the Treasury Department files with the Senate a list containing the name of every man and every corporation to whom money has been refunded.

Senators, that is not asking too much of our Treasury Department. This money belongs to the people, and I think that millions of it was paid in properly and that millions of it is being refunded that ought to remain in the Treasury. But we do not know. We can not get the concrete testimony showing us whether it is just or unjust. John Jones receives a $5,000 refund. There is not a line telling the Senate why it was refunded.

A month or more ago I introduced a resolution in the Senate, which was adopted, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to file with the Senate a list of the names of all those to whom taxes amounting to $25,000 and more have been refunded, and that list came in this morning, the day this bill is brought up for consideration. There is only one copy of the report here for Senators to see. There is not a scintilla of testimony to show why the people named received the refunds. The names are given, by States, of those receiving above $25,000, as I asked.

I have insisted heretofore—and I am going to continue to insist—that the Treasury Department shall furnish the Senate a list of the names of all those to whom they refunded this money, giving a brief statement as to why they refunded the money. You can not pass a bill through any commissioner's court in the United States, in any county or State, appropriating the money of the people for any purpose without somebody explaining in detail why it is to be done. Yet here we are giving the Secretary of the Treasury permission to go ahead and dole this money out, and then he will come back at the next session of Congress and say, "I want a hundred million more."

Mr. President, they have refunded, since Mr. Mellon has been in the office of Secretary of the Treasury, about a billion dollars. I have not the slightest faith in the proposition that anything like all of that money should have been refunded. I believe that more than half of it, or, perhaps, three-fourths of it, ought to have remained in the Treasury. I do not believe that so many mistakes have been made in collecting taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I have heard the Senator say the same thing quite a number of times. Let me explain to him how a great deal of this happens.

Under the 1917 law, when extreme taxes were imposed upon the American people on account of our entry into the war, the returns were made, and the time limit within which payments were to be made, or the returns contested by the Government, was but brief. It was but two years, I think. At that time there arose many of these disputes. It was a new proposition entirely, and the taxpayer in making his returns himself was not positive whether the returns were correct, and the Government itself, having at that time millions and millions of returns, and the bureau not being built up, could not possibly reach them. So what did they do? Under the law the bureau could impose a jeopardy assessment, in order to protect the Government itself, of course, not knowing whether the jeopardy assessment was too little or too great.

The Senator is too honorable a man to contend that the Government should not return any surplus over what should have been collected from a taxpayer when the Government, to save itself from the outlawing of a tax case, imposed a jeopardy assessment, which the bureau knew would cover everything due, and more, too, possibly. I assure the Senator that a great many of the cases are of that class.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. The Senator will recall that a number of times I brought up this question of tax returns.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will remember that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and I tried very hard to have included in the last revenue law a provision for publicity. The Senator will recall that instead of the Senate putting in that publicity provision, a commission was established, consisting of five Members of the House and five Members of the Senate, who were going immediately to work and get all the facts and figures about these returns of enormous sums of taxes, and to bring it to the Senate and to the House, so that we could have the facts before us, as I remember the argument of the Senator from Utah at the time. That was two or three years ago. Has that commission ever functioned?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. What has it done? Has it ever made a report to Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I can go over to my office now and bring here the volumes for the Senator's examination if he desires.

Mr. McKELLAR. What did the committee ever report to Congress itself?

Mr. SMOOT. It made reports or recommendations first, as the resolution required, suggesting certain amendments to the revenue law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Have they been acted on?

Mr. SMOOT. Most of them were incorporated in the bill as it passed the House and is now before the Finance Committee of the Senate. If the Senator desires, I will see that he gets a copy of that report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say in behalf of——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I must proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield further.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to finish what I started to say. The Senator from Utah says he will bring here the information to-morrow. It is too late to lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen. We are about to pass a bill carrying an appropriation of $130,000,000. I want every man and woman in the country who has unjustly paid taxes to the Government to have that money refunded. There can be no misunderstanding about my position in the matter. If a mistake has been made, I want to have it corrected. We are entitled to know what the mistake is and to whom the money is to be refunded. If I am to be called upon to vote $130,000,000 to be handed out to various taxpayers of the country, I am entitled to be told why I am asked to do that thing.

Mr. President, there is no testimony here to-day to justify me in voting for this sum, and I do not intend to vote for it. I have not voted for such matters in the past and I am not going to vote for them in the future unless I have satisfactory information. At the same time, I want every man who has money coming to him justly to receive it; but I am not going to vote to turn money over to these people on the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury or the clerks under him without knowing in each case why such action is taken.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why does the Senator keep on referring to some "man"? Does he realize that a man is not a corporation?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why talk about some "man" getting this money?

Mr. HEFLIN. The corporations in the main seem to be the ones who are to get it. I notice a refund is provided to the Washington News of over $300,000, and this is a presidential year! I do not know that there is any connection whatever between the two. There are other newspapers which have had refunds in this presidential year involving thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. I understand Mr. Hearst had a refund of $600,000 or $700,000 in the last two or three years, and that he and Mr. Mellon have become exceedingly warm friends.

Mr. President, we ought not to conduct the business of the Government in this slipshod fashion. Is it asking too much, I repeat, to require Mr. Mellon and those under him to furnish a list containing the name of every man and every corporation who is to receive a refund or who has received it, the amount received, and the reason for the refund? Senators, that is not asking too much.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] offered a resolution, which was agreed to, providing $5,000 to conduct an investigation of the cotton exchanges. They have robbed the South this last year of over $130,000,000. I have a resolution pending to increase the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD available to each Senator in order that the people of the country may obtain the truth as to what occurs in this Chamber. Some Senators say it will cost money to increase the number of copies as I have proposed. We quibble about these little things, but a proposition to vote a refund of $130,000,000 to the big money kings of the country is swallowed down without batting an eye. It is wrong, Mr. President. I am going to keep on making this fight until some day I shall get a measure through the Congress requiring whoever is at the head of the Treasury Department to send to Congress the names of everybody to whom they have refunded money, the amount refunded, and the reason for refunding it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 53, at the end of line 13, add the following:

Fairfield, Ala., post office, $100,000, a suitable building site to be donated by the city of Fairfield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment of the junior Senator from Alabama. It has not been estimated for, it has not been reported by the committee, and it is outside the rule in every respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Chair rules on the point of order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ruling in accordance with the rule of the Senate. If the Senator from Alabama wishes to appeal, the appeal, of course, may be argued. However, the Senator from Alabama is recognized for an ex post facto argument.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me state that I am compelled to make the point of order. I would be glad to add the item for $100,000 for the purpose suggested if I had my own personal preference in the matter. My own State of Wyoming has not a single item of this kind included in the bill, although the authorization was given for such items long ago, but they are not inserted in this bill. If we open the door for one amendment of this kind, there will be dozens more to follow. We have refused to grant at least a dozen up to this time that we were asked to include in the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me to make a short statement?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The present law relating to public buildings provides specifically that items may be offered, and, in my judgment, if the Chair will look at the law itself, he will change his ruling.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Tennessee is correct in his position. I want to say that unless Wyoming is left out of the bill I agree that Alabama is the only other State that is left out of it.

We have a place there in Jefferson County, near Birmingham, named Fairfield, with a population of about 15,000. The postal receipts of the post office there are about $20,000 per annum. This is an extraordinary case. The people of Fairfield are willing to give to the Government a site worth $30,000. I submit that there ought to be an exception made in this case.

I understand that the bill contains a provision to erect a post-office building at Rushville, Ind., the old home town of my good friend the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. The population of Rushville is 5,498. If Rushville is to have a post-office building with that small population, then in the case of Fairfield, with a population of more than 15,000 and with postal receipts of $20,000 a year and a site worth $30,000 to be contributed by the city, upon which the building is to be constructed, it seems to me that we might well make an exception and adopt the amendment and see what we can persuade the House to do in the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I would be glad to help the Senator from Alabama if I could. I think there will be an opportunity very soon to consider these matters, because Members of the House, I am told, are figuring now on what can be incorporated in an appropriation bill which is to follow this one. If the Senator had desired to have his amendment considered, it should have been sent to the committee at least a day in advance of the hearings on the bill; but even if that had been done, the committee could not have consented to putting it in this bill, because such items must be specifically estimated for and specifically budgeted, if I may use that term, and provided for by the legislation heretofore indicated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to page 4 of the public buildings act of May 25, 1926, and to this language:

Provided further, That the act making said appropriations may provide for any other buildings contained in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury hereinafter provided for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is about time that the Chair should defend its ruling. The language quoted by the Senator from Tennessee affords no foothold whatever for the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. We appreciate the position of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and his assurance that we will have his sympathy and aid in doing something along this line later on.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the building referred to in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not in his annual report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if it is not in the annual report then it is not within the act to which I have called attention, but if it is in the annual report then it is within that language.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not in the report, and not only that, but I will say to the Senate that the original $100,000,000 appropriated was to cover a 10-year program. At this session of Congress we have added another $100,000,000, so there is a total of $200,000,000 authorized for this purpose. We have appropriated in the pending bill almost $20,000,000, which is all we can appropriate in any one year under the law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] when the next appropriation bill is coming over to which he has referred?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I have the date.

Mr. BLACK. Will it be during this session?

Mr. WARREN. I only know by conversation with Members of the House Committee on Appropriations. I know that they are taking up this troublesome matter of public buildings and are going to give it attention during the present session of Congress if they possibly can.

Mr. HEFLIN. It will be at this session of Congress some time, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to think there is going to be another general appropriation made for public buildings outside of the District of Columbia. The present bill carries all that the law provides for, which is nearly $20,000,000. I would not want the Senator to misunderstand that situation.

Mr. BLACK. It leaves $100,000, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not tell the Senator without examining the figures.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from New York had the floor. I want to offer another amendment when he gets through.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not want to detain the Senate. I thought we were through with this matter. I want to make some comments on another matter.

Mr. HARRISON. I have two amendments that I want to offer to the bill. I think a mere reading of them will appeal to the Senator from Wyoming and that he will not make the point of order. Of course, I know that the point of order, if made, will be sustained by the Chair under the ruling of the Chair just made. These amendments of mine, however, differ from the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama in that his amendment carries an appropriation of $100,000, while my amendment carries an appropriation of only $65,000. I offer the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 51, after line 23, insert the following as a new paragraph:

Columbia, Miss., post office and site: For acquisition of site and construction of building at a limit of cost of $65,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I make the point of order on the amendment. It pains me very much to do so, as the Senator must know [laughter], but we have to be one family and treated all alike here. As to public building appropriations, we are either going to be ruined right here or we are going to pass the bill exactly as it now reads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to offer one more amendment. I have promised so much to these people, and they have made such strong appeals for this building that I hope my appeal will not fall on deaf ears.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not object to the amendment being stated, so that it may go into the RECORD, but I shall make the point of order on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 51, after line 23, it is proposed to insert a new clause as follows:

Lumberton, Miss., post office and site: For acquisition of site and construction of building at a limit of cost of $65,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. KING. I move to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report a bill reducing the aggregate amount $150,000,000. That strikes out the item of $130,000,000 referred to by the Senator from Alabama, because Congress will be in session for some time and the Secretary of the Treasury may submit to Congress an estimate for whatever may be needed before it shall adjourn. The remainder is to reduce the appropriation of $32,667,750 requested for the administration of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am ready for a vote on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The motion was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE NEAR GARLAND CITY, ARK.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1104) granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River near Garland City, Ark.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the name "Arkansas," to strike out the words "within 5 miles of the bridge of the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Co. in the counties of Miller and Lafayette, in the State of Arkansas," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Garland City, Ark., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of the bridge constructed under authority of this act, the State Highway Commission of Arkansas may so adjust the rate of toll to be charged as to produce sufficient revenue to maintain, operate, and repair the bridge and repay the original cost of constructing the same, including any interest paid on borrowed money and discounts necessarily required in financing such original construction, and shall after the repayment thereof maintain and operate such bridge as a free bridge.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River at or near Garland City, Ark."

FLUCTUATIONS IN PRICE OF MAY WHEAT, 1927

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, on February 26 last the Secretary of Agriculture suspended the rule requiring members of grain exchanges to make reports to his department. Following the suspension of that rule there were wide fluctuations in grain prices throughout the country. Senate Resolution 40, offered by me, directs the Secretary of Agriculture to make a report to the Senate, giving the reasons for the suspension of that rule and the effect of its suspension upon wheat growers of the country. This information is requested by the Texas Wheat Growers' Association, and I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution and trust it may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the table and consider Senate Resolution 40. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. Is it a resolution just now submitted?

Mr. MAYFIELD. The resolution was submitted by me on December 12, 1927. Similar resolutions have been submitted and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think there can be any objection to the adoption of the resolution, as it merely calls for information.

Mr. CURTIS. Is that the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 40) submitted by Mr. MAYFIELD on December 12, 1927, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to investigate, first, the effect upon the producers of grain of the suspension by the Secretary of Agriculture of the requirement for the making of reports by members of grain-futures exchanges, and, second, the situation in respect of the 1927 May wheat future which existed on the grain-futures exchanges during the life of such future for the purpose of determining the cause of the wide fluctuations in the price of wheat during the early months of 1927, and especially after February 26, 1927, the date of the suspension of such requirement; and to make a full and complete report of such investigation, including (1) a statement of the reasons for, and a showing of the effect upon the producers of grain of, the suspension of such requirement; (2) a statement of the quantity of wheat purchased and the quantity of wheat sold on 1927 May future contracts, and the quantity of wheat actually delivered and the quantity of wheat actually received on such contracts; and (3) the names of the parties doing heavy trading in such futures.

LAW ENFORCEMENT—ADDRESS BY MRS. CLEM SHAVER

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on January 10, 1928, at the Mayflower Hotel in this city by Mrs. Clem Shaver on the subject of law enforcement.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PATRIOTISM VS. NULLIFICATION AS MRS. CLEMENT SHAVER SEES THEM—ADDRESS MADE AT MAYFLOWER HOTEL IN WASHINGTON LAST WEEK

Madam Chairman and fellow citizens: Most of us like to think of ourselves as patriots and law-abiding citizens. Patriotism is a very inspiring word—some of us like to roll it round our tongues on the Fourth of July and Washington's Birthday. As a matter of fact, a large majority of the American people are true patriots, and, yet, patriotism as understood in the United States to-day, is one of the most abused and mistreated words in the English language. When a brewery or night club or a hotel where liquor is permitted to be served in defiance of the law flies the flag of the United States from its roof, thinking this act the last word in patriotism, it becomes easy to realize to what depths of misconception of patriotism many of our citizens have fallen. Strange as it may seem, abuse of the letter and spirit of patriotism has been especially flagrant since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as an integral, vital, continuing part of that most sacred of all public documents, the Magna Charta of America, which grew out of, and must be taken in conjunction with, the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights.

Now, the mere adoption of the eighteenth amendment has nothing whatever to do with the frequent abuse of the word "patriotism"; indeed, it seems a strange paradox that an amendment which has proved itself to be so beneficent a part of our Constitution, and therefore should largely increase our love for, and pride in our country, and quicken our respect for its laws and institutions, should be in the least responsible for abuse of patriotism.

In truth much responsibility for the deplorable lack of patriotism in the United States to-day can be laid on the doorsteps of the Association Opposed to Prohibition, and the so-called Church Temperance Society, whose national secretary is Dr. James Empringham, of New York. In regard to this, a news item cut from The Woman Voter early in 1927 made the following interesting statement:

"The Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment in their sworn report, filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress as required by the Federal corrupt practice act of 1925, shows that Dr. James Empringham, national secretary of the National Episcopal Church Temperance Society, received on January 24, 1927, a payment for services rendered the association of $100. On January 29, 1927, the Delaware division of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment paid him $50 as pay and expenses at Middletown mass meeting for speaker. This same division, also reported on October 14, 1926, the payment of $50 for pay and transportation of speaker. On September 10, 1926, they paid him $50 for New York City Dover mass meeting.

"Dr. James Empringham, national secretary of the National Episcopal Church Temperance Society, recently issued a statement indicating that 1,032 clergymen approved modification of the Volstead Act.

"Bishop Manning, of New York, some time ago pointed out that this so-called Church Temperance Society is no real part of the Episcopal Church but has only a parasitic connection with it. He declared that Dr. James Empringham, who as national secretary of the society took a prohibition poll two years ago, was apparently on the pay roll of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. He asked the identity of an anonymous donor of $50,000 to the society.

"Doctor Empringham has said he was not and never had been on the pay roll of the association named. 'I have no expectations of being on that pay roll,' he said. 'I wish I were. I would like to be. It is nothing to be ashamed of, and I could use the money.'

"At the office of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment it was said there was no record of any salary payment to Doctor Empringham—of course not. 'The donation of $50,000 to the temperance society,' said Doctor Empringham, 'was from the estate of Letitia Willet Garrison, widow of Cornelius Garrison. She died in London in 1925.'

"It is indeed gratifying to find upon investigation that Doctor Empringham does not speak for the Episcopal Church of America, but speaks for a defunct temperance society. For him to assume to speak for the million and a quarter of Episcopalians in this country is something which the facts show he had not the slightest authority to do.

"The mind of the House of Bishops was expressed at the general convention in New Orleans last October by the adoption without a dissenting vote of the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That, facing the danger of the spirit of lawlessness in American life, we welcome the renewed efforts of the Government of the United States to enforce strictly and impartially the prohibition law.'

"Empringham's statement does not represent the church's attitude. What he may say or small groups employing him, does not express the mind of the Episcopal Church. Thus the facts show he is in the employ of the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment."

The triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church convening at New Orleans in October, 1925, declared its support of the Constitution, the eighteenth amendment, and the Volstead Act. No further comment is necessary. We merely quote from the printed record. It is believed that a large majority of the women of our country are dry, law-abiding, patriotic upholders of the Constitution, including the eighteenth amendment. They would be frankly ashamed to be otherwise. Unfortunately, a small minority have associated themselves with violators of the eighteenth amendment, the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment, and other wet societies known as lawbreakers. These women are known as "wets" and it may be suggested by some that they do not as a whole represent the highest type of American womanhood. With this small percentage, the dry women who stand for strict enforcement of all laws, do not need to reckon seriously. They have already placed themselves in their own little niche outside the pale of law-abiding citizens, and are in all probability destined to remain in their own exclusive little circle. No one envies this small group, nor will law-abiding citizens emulate their example.

The truly patriotic women of America, representing the highest type of motherhood and wifehood, stand unswervingly behind the Constitution and its 19 amendments. Each of these amendments was voted into the Constitution by the calm, considered, orderly judgment of the legislatures of 46 sovereign States. No amendment has yet been repealed or nullified, and the eighteenth amendment is destined to remain in the Constitution. Neither will the Volstead Act be modified until the Congress consents. It is written in the stars and in the hearts and determination of American women—and is as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Our newspapers—most of them wringing wets—are printing on their front pages to-day, in blazing headlines (and they will continue to do so up to, and including Friday) one of the best arguments ever set forth in behalf of prohibition; it is this: A man and a woman, whose names are better left out of a meeting like this, will be shocked to death in the electric chair at Sing Sing Thursday night—all because of whisky. Nothing in the world but whisky caused them to lose all moral restraint, all thought of their mothers, their lifemates, and their children. Nothing in the world but whisky caused them to begin their life of illicit, clandestine, repulsive relations. Too much whisky led them to buy a sash weight and a coil of picture wire, which started them on their way to the electric chair.

This is only one of many such examples. The front pages of our newspapers are filled with such grim, sordid stories. Few have been played up as much by a sensational press, for reasons known only to an editor. But after reading the newspapers this week, who is there that can argue for letting down the bars of prohibition in the slightest degree, or repealing the eighteenth amendment? We think even the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment will

"Fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away."

This association has joined forces with Dr. James Empringham's little club and other wet organizations, apparently for the purpose of establishing a sufficient, unfailing supply of "good" liquor that they and all "wets" may slake their thirst at all times without embarrassing association with the bootlegger at the back door, and confronting the ever-present danger to human life of the poisonous liquor now being dispensed by these traffickers in illegal merchandise. At least no one has ever been able to discover any other excuse for the existence of these wet organizations.

No; the eighteenth amendment can not be repealed or nullified. It will always remain a part of the Constitution, because a majority in one branch only of the legislatures of 13 States is sufficient to preserve the amendment intact. In other words, the State senate, or the house of representatives, having a majority of votes in favor of the eighteenth amendment, can frustrate any attempt by the wets to repeal it, or bring about modification of the Volstead Act. It is not expected that the dry Congress will be willing to go on record as being in favor of modifying the Volstead Act for enforcing the eighteenth amendment, so that the same shall not prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of beverages not in fact intoxicating. The final word will rest with the majority in both Houses of Congress. If then a small majority in either branch of a State legislature can defeat an attempt to nullify or repeal the eighteenth amendment, does any one seriously think there is even a remote possibility of a sufficient change of sentiment in the United States to enable any wet organizations to carry the legislatures of 36 States for repeal? If so, they must be totally unaware of the overwhelmingly "dry" sentiment in our rural communities, from which the majority of our legislators are recruited. Ask any candidate for the gubernatorial office, the United States Senate, the legislature, what sort of reception he encounters when he visits the rural districts of his State; does he find them wet or dry? There is no chance that the Volstead Act will be repealed by the present or the next Congress; the dry majority in both Senate and House is securely dry for the present. By 1932 dry women voters will have numerically increased, presenting an impregnable wall of opposition to any silly, fruitless tampering with the eighteenth amendment by the un-American wets. "Un-American," "unpatriotic"—harsh words, you say? But all must look askance to-day at the professed patriotism of the man or woman who while loudly proclaiming their Americanism, and vociferously joining in the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner, that masterpiece of Francis Scott Key, and "My Country 'tis of Thee!" carry a flask on the hip, and maintain a still in the bathroom.

Eight years ago the eighteenth amendment was born; eight years ago dry, law-enforcement women hung out a sign in the theater of our political life on which appeared the cryptic letters "S. R. O."—"standing room only" for all those eager candidates who would seek office by the wet route. Only a short time ago! Yet, now those letters are changed, and we read the pronouncement of the dry women: "No wet candidate nor any '50–50' or any contemptible 'pussyfooting,' half-breed, 'law enforcement' kind need apply—all such are dripping wet to women." No amount of bluster nor high-sounding assertions about "law enforcement" such as "Well, it is the law (prohibition); why ask the question?" Nor proclaim loudly for all the world to hear "If I am elected to this high office, I shall feel that it is my solemn duty to support the eighteenth amendment and enforce the Volstead Act" when their public record shows a consistent, perhaps lifelong, effort in the opposite direction. A man or woman candidate must seek public favor upon their record, and that alone; their actions in the eye of God and their countrymen.

"Our acts our angels are, for good or ill.
The fatal shadows that walk by us still."

It is the record that counts.

Only the woman who has had a beastly drunkard in her family circle can have any conception of what the demon rum means in her home. Only such a woman can appreciate the meaning of the blessed light of a new-born day brought to our American womanhood by adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

O! The morning stars sang together on that 16th day of January, 1920, when the new-born infant "Prohibition" sprang into being, child of the labor and travail of a Nation of patriotic American women! Mothers of the noblest race ever sent by Divine guidance to tread the path of the wilderness and establish the greatest country in the civilized world.

Shall these women ever submit to repeal of that blessed amendment which has brought them such joy, such deliverance from woe unspeakable? We shall render the decision and without meddlesome interference from any foreign country. Only a few days ago we read that a newspaper in a foreign country advocated that America repeal the eighteenth amendment. Think of the effrontery of it: I ask the women of this organization, "Shall we allow a foreign press and a foreign country to dictate what laws shall be obeyed and what laws repealed in our country?" The Monroe doctrine is not yet a dead letter!

The American people are fully able to decide what laws shall be written into their Constitution, without blatant suggestions from European countries, and will continue to be the arbiters, under God, of their own destiny.

Our forefathers appreciated the priceless value of our Constitution! It was Daniel Webster, one of our greatest patriots and statesmen, who declared in his famous speech before the Congress in 1850, "I stand on the Constitution! I need no other platform; I shall know no other country."

It is to statesmen of such caliber, those who lived and moved in the long ago, that we owe our Constitution, our Declaration of Independence, our Bill of Rights.

Men and women of the Democratic Party, we have come to the parting of the ways; the issue is joined. Are we as patriots, committed to the support of the Constitution with its 19 amendments, or shall we permit the organized forces from within the party, whose leaders are "machine" politicians, to totally disrupt and disintegrate—ruin for all time possibly—our great party of Jefferson and Jackson? Shall we permit them to bring about the destruction of the party, and emasculate the Constitution, rendering it null and void of those principles for the perpetuation of which our forefathers fought and died? Rule or ruin! That is the policy of every corrupt politician. In the national election of 1920, for the first time in the history of the country, women in all parties were enabled to go to the polls and vote—a marvelous, though tardy privilege. It was the great adventure for them after that of marriage and motherhood.

Dry Democratic women having helped win the battle for suffrage had a right to expect in 1920 that the leaders in their party would provide candidates on the tickets that women could support and vote for. In other words, a dry ticket. Instead, expediency-loving "machine" politicians, journeyed to far-away California, traveling in utmost discomfort for five weary days and nights in intense summer heat, for what purpose? To offer the dry women of America a "dry" ticket? Not at all—the mountain labored and brought forth a "mouse," as far as the bright hopes of dry women were concerned. Instead of a dry ticket a dripping wet ticket was named. Did the dry women vote for these candidates? They did not. The 1920 Democratic ticket received only 34 per cent of the total vote cast, which was its worst beating (up to that time).

In 1924 dry Democratic women hoped for better luck, reluctant to believe the leaders would put another wet ticket in the field. So again they journeyed; this time to New York City, and, though these dry women voted through all those weary ballots for a notably dry candidate, did they get a ticket any dry patriotic woman could support? They did not. Again the mountain labored and brought forth—a wet compromise ticket. Did the dry women support this ticket? The answer lies in the fact that the 1924 ticket received only 29 per cent of total vote cast, the lowest watermark in the history of the party of Jackson, whose natal day we celebrate on Thursday. Our last defeat was our worst and most humiliating; both of these tickets were defeated by more than seven millions, in 1924 by far more than that.

We paid our respects a moment ago to "machine," expediency-loving politicians. There is no room left for the most futile argument by the most plausible politician for the very reprehensible, inexcusable course of action as pursued by the Democratic Party in the past eight years is without warrant, has brought only disgrace upon our great party, and has in no way been conducive to victory. Wet tickets in 1920 and 1924, which dry women scornfully repudiated, is the answer to the question: "Why can not the Democrats win?" Have they not learned a lesson from their bitter experience and humiliating, disgraceful defeats in 1920 and 1924? We fear not. The average politician can not see through the proverbial millstone. Expediency is their motto, stupidity their most prominent characteristic, and party regularity their fetich. When the Democratic Party wakes up and gives the women a dry ticket, regardless of party dissensions and selfish strivings for gain on the part of the wet elements, then the Democrats will win and not before—the time is past when dry women will tolerate only wet tickets, as in 1920 and 1924.

On the wall, at the feast of Belshazzar, appeared the mystic words "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." (Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting.)

Dry women have weighed the Democratic Party in the balance and found it wanting. "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin!" Oh, if women are not given tickets they can conscientiously support, as surely as the sun rises the dry women will shortly put a ticket of their own in the field! Politicians might as well be preparing for it! When that day dawns the dry women in the Democratic Party will say with Will Shakespeare, "Now is the winter of our discontent made into glorious summer" by the adoption of the prohibition amendment and the marvelous courage of the dry women of America!

Even more pitiful than the sad wives and mothers of drunkards are the little children. These helpless, hopeless little ones whom the Master cherished are holding out to us pathetic, pleading, wan little hands—"infants crying in the night; infants crying for the light; and with no language but a cry"—crying to the mothers of the world for help and succor!

Do you hear the children crying, Oh, my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
But that can not dry their tears!
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are singing in the nests;
The young fawn are skipping in the shadows,
The young clouds are blowing in the west!
But the young, young children, Oh, my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly.
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

O patriotic men and women of America! let us redouble our efforts to make this a wholly dry nation, whose every citizen shall be loyal and obedient in thought, word, and deed to the Constitution and the flag of our Nation!

Let us stand at "salute" and solemnly proclaim:

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands."

THE AGRICULTURAL PROBLEM—SPEECH BY SENATOR ROBINSON OF INDIANA

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, on November 1, 1927, at St. Louis, a large and representative convention of farmers of Southern and Western States was held. I had the pleasure of attending that convention and hearing the principal address which was delivered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. The address was of a very high order and covered the agricultural problem in a masterly way. It received the most enthusiastic approval of all who were attending that convention. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The marvelous development of the American Republic is the outstanding phenomenon of history. From the period of exploration until the beginning of the Revolution little progress had been made toward the settlement of what is now continental United States. It is true there were 13 tiny Colonies on our eastern seaboard with a total population of approximately 3,000,000 men, women, and children; but very little had been attempted west of the Allegheny Mountains. It was a time when a philosophy of government prevailed which tended to submerge individuality, effort, and initiative. The King was the government and government was responsible to the ruler. The King was the sovereign and all sovereignty was in the Crown. The King was, to a large degree, the state; indeed, the King was everything.

A comparatively small group of thinkers of that day convinced that the prevailing system was wrong, had the courage to announce an entirely different philosophy of government. In their view sovereignty should be in the people, not in the Crown. Government should be responsible to the people, not to the King. The people themselves should be citizens, not subjects; and government should derive its just powers from the consent of the governed.

It was a time when there were distinct classes of society. A child might be born in the aristocracy, and if so, there he remained until death. Still more were born in the so-called middle class, and if so, they had little opportunity for advancement. The greater majority were of the so-called lower class, whence most of us come, and if one were born in this status, he remained there until stricken with the hand of death. Under this system there had been, could be, no great progress, which can come only with individual opportunity, and freedom in the choice of life work.

The little group of thinkers of that day insisted on a philosophy of government placing sovereignty in the people, under which every child should have a fair deal in life and equal opportunity with others. This would make for progress. With this philosophy as their ideal a little group of 56 Americans met at Philadelphia in 1776 and signed the Declaration of Independence. For the ideals contained therein they rallied the patriots of that day and waged the Revolution. Some time after peace had been signed another little group met in Philadelphia to formulate a system of government, and after four months of deliberation there came from this conference the Constitution of the United States, which made the philosophy fought for in the Revolution the fundamental law of the American Republic.

It is a significant thing that both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were thought out, prepared, and put together largely by the farmers of that day. The great majority of the people were engaged in agriculture, and those who were not very largely followed maritime pursuits.

With a philosophy of government provided in the Constitution which safeguarded thoroughly the rights of the individual, progress was rapid. Agriculture continued to be, however, as it has ever been and must continue to be, the basic industry of the land.

In 1826 the National Road from Washington, D. C., to St. Louis, Mo., was projected in order to encourage the settlement of the country west of the Alleghenies. Then began the movement toward the Pacific coast, which never ended until the goal was reached. Let it never be forgotten that it was the embattled farmers of that period who blazed the trail, pioneered the way, and started the country on its road to glory. Forests were felled, crops were planted, and civilization moved westward. There was no occasion for a national agricultural policy at that time, for the reason that we had more land than could be utilized.

Then came railroad transportation, and the great transcontinental lines were begun, the people of the country giving their attention largely to the development of our enormous inland empire. Labor-saving machinery came into existence, and ultimately great national policies began to take shape. Cities sprang up, and the movement from the country to large industrial centers began. Population increased, and before we were hardly aware of the fact the forests had disappeared, most arable land had been cultivated, and much of it had been exhausted. The movement to the cities increased; the population in the rural districts diminished. The great industrial era had arrived, and we came face to face with the possible problem of overindustrialization.

The country had been visited with financial panics throughout the years at regular intervals, and it became important that we have a national banking policy. As its basis the Federal reserve law was passed by Congress in 1913 over the opposition of many of the most prominent bankers of the country, who insisted the policy was wrong. The trouble in the past had been largely due to the concentration of surplus credits in New York City. Under the new law this surplus was distributed throughout the country among 12 Federal reserve districts, thus making it possible to use these surplus credits to relieve emergency conditions, always certain that an ample supply would be on hand at all times in every part of the country.

As the beginning of a national labor policy the Adamson law was passed in 1916, followed by the restrictive immigration acts of 1921 and 1924. The transportation act was passed in 1920, forming the basis of a great railroad and carrier policy which considers 5½ and 6 per cent a fair return for transportation services rendered, and which significantly provides for a revolving fund, earnings of over 6 per cent, at the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, being placed in this fund for the relief of weaker roads.

We have the Federal Trade Commission, a military policy, a tariff policy, and, even though the subject matter is of very recent origin, we are already rapidly developing a national radio policy.

Throughout all the development of the country, however, we have never thus far inaugurated a great national farm policy, much as we have needed it for many years.

There are in this country at the present time 6,500,000 farmers and a total population in the rural districts of approximately 30,000,000 people. Farm conditions have gone from bad to worse. In this day of organization the agricultural interests of the country have not been able to organize. It has been comparatively easy for manufacturers, for instance, since there are comparatively few units involved; but with the large number engaged in the country's basic industry, without which we could not exist, it has thus far been impossible to effect organization without Government assistance.

No one disputes the existence of a farm problem to-day. The mortgage loans of the farm interests in the country have increased from $4,000,000,000 in 1910 to more than $12,000,000,000 in 1925; and it is common knowledge that during the last several years wheat, corn, cotton, hogs, and all farm products have frequently sold for less than the cost of production. What the American farmer needs to-day, therefore, is an opportunity to develop bargaining power that will assure him prices for his crops and commodities that will give him a fair return on his investment and labor. To gain this end it is necessary to control crop surpluses, make the tariff effective on those commodities where duties are provided for, and to provide a system of orderly marketing for the great cotton crop of the South to the end that the price for same may be thoroughly stabilized.

With this purpose in mind those of us who favor real agricultural relief have been backing the McNary-Haugen bill, which, roughly speaking, would provide for a Federal farm board composed of 12 members—1 from each of the 12 Federal land bank districts—such board to have authority, by use of a revolving fund provided for in the bill, to remove surplus production from the market in any given year; this would take the produce temporarily out of the export trade, where in the past it has always forced the home market of farm commodities down to the level of the world price, thus tending to drag the American farmer down to the level of the European peasantry.

The bill also provides for an equalization fee to be assessed against commodities entering the market, which would make every producer equally liable for any losses that might arise out of surplus production and operation. This feature of the bill is of the utmost importance, since, if enacted into law, it would require every individual in the industry to carry his share of the load. This would bring about thorough organization, and when the farmers of the country are effectively organized they will be able to handle their own problems. This proposed legislation would also form the basis for a great national farm policy which we must ultimately have if agriculture is to be saved in this country.

One thing is certain, all of us live from the farm. Our clothing comes from the farm; our food comes from the farm; and while we might do without many so-called necessities of life, we can not get along without food. We must eat to live. We must eat off the farm, and if we do not get our food from the American farm it must come from foreign quarters.

The movement to the cities continues and grows. Youngsters are leaving the country and becoming industrialized in congested centers, so that for the most part only the elders remain to face the mortgage. This being true, the question naturally arises, "What will happen when they, too, are gone?"

The time must come in this country when the American farmer can have something to say about the price he is receiving for his commodities. He can not continue to produce his crops at a loss. I want the day to arrive speedily when the wheat grower of the North, the cotton planter of the South, and the farmers generally will have as much to say about the price to be paid for their products as those in other industries can say concerning theirs. When this time comes pessimism will leave the farm. It will be replaced by optimism and by happiness and contentment as in the days gone by, and the sweetness and romance of American rural life will return.

The McNary-Haugen bill may not be perfect, but it is a start in the right direction, and all legislation is experimental until tried out. Though it was passed as recently as 1913, in the 14 years intervening, the Federal reserve act has been amended so much that the amendments occupy more space in the law books than the original act itself. That is true of many other important laws on the statute books. They must be altered from time to time to make them more workable. So with the McNary-Haugen bill; we can amend it if time shows the need for amendment; but its passage would immediately hearten the agricultural population of the country; raise the morale of the people engaged in the industry, and what is more important, it would be the beginning of a great national farm policy which is absolutely necessary if the industry is to be saved and stabilized.

Brazil has considerable of a monopoly on coffee and we pay the Brazilian price—not only that, but we pay the price set by the Brazilian coffee planter. The same is true of rubber, which is largely controlled by Great Britain. We pay the price set by the rubber producers and this is because those countries have a farm policy. I want the time to come soon when the American farmer will be enabled by his government to be as fortunately situated. Certainly he is entitled to his own home market, unhampered by disastrous competition from commodities produced in countries where the cost of production and standards of living are below those in America; and American agriculture is entitled to adequate protection from our Government.

The food supply is the first line of defense of any nation. Armies and navies must have food as well as the civilian population. If we continue during the next 10 years along the path we are traveling at present, agriculture will be dead in this country and we shall be forced to import our food supply very largely from an unfriendly world. If we ever reach that point our independence itself will be jeopardized, and the tragedy of this whole matter is the fact that history shows that in any country where agriculture has been permitted to die, it has never been successfully revived. Let us take action while there is yet time.

We have seen nations die during the past 10 years. The great Russian Empire, the great German Empire, the great Austria-Hungarian Empire, the Turkish Empire, Montenegro, all have perished before our eyes in the past decade. Historians could, if they had the inclination and perspective, write of the rise and fall of these great empires of yesterday. Nations live and die just like individuals. We want the American Republic, with its beneficent philosophy of government and its gospel of a fair deal for every child born under the American flag, to live on forever and never die.

Things do not happen in this world; they are brought about. Great national problems must be solved as they arise. The greatest problem that confronts the American people at the present time is that of agriculture, which involves the Nation's food supply. To work sincerely for the solution of this problem is the duty of every American throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Just as little groups of representative patriots, with an ideal, brought forth the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, just so will these modern groups of representative patriots, with an ideal, bring forth relief for American agriculture which will save the Republic and make their names immortal when the history of these critical times shall be written.

COLUMBIA RIVER BASIN PROJECT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, out of order, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, for my colleague [Mr. DILL] and myself, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 1462) for the adoption of the Columbia Basin reclamation project, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 345) thereon.

I had intended to ask for the present consideration of the bill, but the chairman of the committee desires to have it go over. However, before the bill goes to the calendar I wish to offer an amendment on behalf of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which is agreeable to his colleague and also to the chairman of the committee and to my colleague and myself. I ask that it may be adopted, and then ask that the bill as amended may go to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no appropriation for construction under the gravity plan shall be made until a compact shall have been entered into between the States, either to determine the allocation of waters and definite storage elevation and areas or to determine the basic principles that for all times shall govern these matters; and

Provided further, That the passage of this act shall not in any respect whatever prejudice, affect, or militate against the rights of the State of Idaho, or the residents, or the people thereof, touching any matter, or thing, or property, or property interests, relative to the construction of the Columbia Basin project.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proviso will be added to the bill as reported, and the bill, with the addition, will go to the calendar.

Mr. JONES. I desire to have the amendment to the bill agreed to and then have the bill as amended go to the calendar. I want the amendment adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill will have to be taken up for consideration. The procedure which the Chair has followed covers everything which the Senator from Washington desires and is much more orderly.

Mr. JONES. No; I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered for the purpose of adopting the amendment, and then let it go to the calendar. I certainly have a right to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In other words, that the bill may be partly considered and then go to the calendar, as in the case of a bill which is considered before 2 o'clock and when that hour arrives, its consideration not being completed, it goes back to the calendar.

Mr. JONES. Certainly by unanimous consent the Senate can do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, the Chair understands that anything may be done by unanimous consent, but he may be permitted to state in his capacity as a Senator that he thinks this is a very bad method of procedure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not know what is in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, but I do not think the Senate ought to proceed to the consideration of the bill, adopt the amendment, and then pass the bill to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is glad to be sustained by the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object to the request of the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. Very well. I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill will go to the calendar.

REPORT ON PRICES, ETC., IN THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, there is on the calendar Senate Resolution 136, providing for the printing of the manuscript entitled "The Report of the Federal Trade Commission on Prices, Profits, and Competition in the Petroleum Industry." I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 136. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask if the resolution has been reported from the committee?

Mr. McMASTER. It has been reported from the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been reported by the Committee on Printing, and the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the request. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 136), which had been reported by Mr. BINGHAM from the Committee on Printing on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "The Report of the Federal Trade Commission on Prices, Profits, and Competition in the Petroleum Industry" be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I desire to say is that the Public Printer informs us that the cost of printing the manuscript as a Senate document will be $2,234.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE RELATIONS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we face a new era in international trade relations. Germany, the defeated nation, freed from monarchical institutions, has taken the lead in the elimination of international commercial rivalries.

Trade agreements tending toward closer cooperation and more intimate associations have been accomplished with her former enemies. America is a party to none of these agreements.

Formation of such associations has been heralded as a threat and menace to American industry. Such, in my judgment, is not the fact.

American business since the peace has constantly and quietly acquired for the benefit of the American people the knowledge, research experience, and inventions of our former enemies. American capital in large amounts has been invested in former enemy-country securities and enterprises.

But we must go further. Partnership in American concerns on the basis of foreign "know how" and American capital should be encouraged. Such concerns manufacturing in America, subject to our laws, increasing competition, improving production, and reducing prices to American consumers, should have the complete approval of our national administration and of our people.

Such manufacturing establishments, available in time of stress for national defense, would be of incalculable value to the country.

Can we doubt that international business partnerships are the best preventive of international conflicts and wars that statesmen can devise? It is time to cease ringing the changes upon war hatreds and animosities, and extend the helping hand of friendship and association to our former enemies.

Business men devised the Dawes plan after diplomats had floundered helplessly for years with the post-bellum economic chaos. Business men, if they are wise and farseeing, must strive to keep the world's peace.

Profitable disposition of manufacturing surpluses in the markets of the world increases national wealth, reduces unemployment, and insures continued prosperity. We are suffering now, and are bound to suffer more. Formation of European commercial agreements to share world markets leaves America under the necessity of participating, or else she must fight for a share of world business.

With no adequate American bottoms to carry surplus American products, the fight is unequal. We are not alive to the importance of an adequate merchant marine. Wise legislation now on our statute books permits our entry, for export purposes, into combinations involving basic industries. This will do much to overcome unemployment and disposition of our surpluses.

In my judgment there never was a time when this country must give greater consideration to the question of unemployment than right now; and I believe that through these combinations there may be effected a state of affairs which will do away with unemployment to a great extent.

Domestic markets should not be dependent alone on domestic consumption. Relieved from the uncertainty of domestic consumption of surplus production, they would be upon sounder financial bases. Immediate improvement should result to the steel, textile, fertilizer, and chemical industries.

Let it be remembered that some of our "infant industries" are predicated upon the confiscated inventions of the people of a nation originally invited into our midst by the terms of our Constitution. No compensation has ever been paid to them. I am glad they are to be paid under the terms of the bill we passed yesterday. With the treatment they have had, I am amazed that such people should still be willing to trust us; and that they should be willing to enter into business partnerships with us is, to me, little short of marvelous.

The domestic problems of farm relief, of national defense, of destruction of industry by ruinous foreign competition, would be brought nearer to solution by such commercial alliances. The occupation of some paid Jeremiahs constantly prophesying war and woe would probably be rendered superfluous; but this misfortune is one that the American people might suffer with resignation, and perhaps some rejoicing.

Let us have done with vituperative attacks on nonexistent enemies. Ten years ago a war to make the world safe for democracy was ended. We were told we fought for no indemnities. It was said we had no grievance against the enemy peoples. Yet, the patent rights of these people were confiscated, and for 10 years they have been at the disposal of that limited group designating itself "the chemical industry." The war made the use of a great nation's inventions safe for this little group.

Ever since we have read from time to time in the chemical trade journals and in the lay press of how wicked, designing, unashamed, and dangerous were those corporations whose patents we confiscated for the benefit of a privileged few. That privileged few in those 10 years has had the benefit of high protective tariffs, of embargoes, of dumping laws, and of investigation of foreign manufacturing costs.

We were told that chemical plants, useful in peace time, essential in war times, could and would be erected in America to take the place of those of other countries. Other countries are enjoying for their agriculturists nitrogenous fertilizers produced from the air, with high plant-food contents. Fertilizer is the foundation of the farmer's financial future.

The American chemical industry, after 10 years of special treatment, has no plant in production turning out nitrogenous fertilizers for our scientific farmers. We have no such plants which in times of emergency could be utilized as munition factories for the national defense.

We are told that only the nation whose patents we confiscated possesses the "know how" to manufacture under these inventions. This people, in spite of our war treatment of their property, have entered into associations with Americans in dyestuffs, colors, pharmaceuticals, synthetic gasoline, and photographic films, all to be manufactured in this country. The thought of this form of competition seems to send cold shivers down the spine of the privileged few who for 10 years have had an American monopoly of these products.

European combinations of these industries provide additional products for the foresighted Americans who have formed alliances with the possessors of the "know how."

The question is, Shall we welcome alien industry and capital to our shores, in accordance with the traditional policy of our Nation, or shall we lend ear to the affrighted clamor, denunciation, and invective of the mouthpieces of an interested and selfish minority? It is high time that we had an official expression of the administration's attitude in the interests of the world peace and domestic prosperity.

American capital is hesitant. American industrialists are reluctant to enter into agreements with other manufacturers to obtain for this country that which we have not, and which would be of benefit to us, so long as the newspapers are filled with vituperative abuse and vague suggestions of Sherman Act prosecutions.

On February 16, here in Washington, was held a conference of executives of the chemical industry. It was held under the auspices of the Department of Commerce, and at that time there were presented for the consideration of the conference reports from some of the commercial attachés.

I hold in my hand a report made by Daniel J. Reagan, assistant commercial attaché at Paris. He speaks on the French chemical industry and the tendencies toward centralization on the part of the participation in France.

These reports are extremely interesting. For instance, this one of Mr. Reagan brings out the fact—and I quote from it—

The World War brought to the attention of the industrial and political leaders of France the acute need for making France self-sufficient as regards chemical resources and equipment. In certain groups, and in particular products, France was already self-contained before the war. This was true for phosphates and superphosphates; for such basic materials as sulphuric acid and hydrochloric acid—

And so forth; but the report says:

As regards dyes, a very strenuous effort and Government cooperation in controlling imports brought from Germany have been required to bring this branch into a position where it is considered to be strong enough for both peace and war time needs. With no natural nitrate resources, France has for years been struggling to develop a synthetic industry for this product, but this development has been so slow that it will undoubtedly be a number of years before those demanding complete self-sufficiency will be satisfied in this field.

Then Mr. Reagan speaks about the major portion of the domestic consumption of nitrogen, and says:

It is still met by Chilean nitrates and synthetic products imported from Germany, but the French output of artificial nitrates is increasing, although not as rapidly as was hoped for.

Then he speaks about the importations of phosphates from Morocco:

Observers of the phosphate situation throughout the world are watching this movement very closely in an effort to determine whether these shipments which it is claimed were sold below prices in the United States will likely involve a threat to invade the American market on a large scale or whether these sales are designed to bring about some possible form of American cooperation in the European market.

It is not alone in France where they are seeking an arrangement with the German producers to bring about these various cartels and combinations, but Mr. Reagan brings out the fact that four of the principal Belgian manufacturers have likewise formed a chemical union in that country to represent their interests in matters similar to those dealt with by the French committee.

This step by the Belgians is looked upon in well-informed quarters as the prelude to participation in certain of the other European chemical ententes now under discussion.

Another quotation from Mr. Reagan:

Although, in general, European international cartels have been formed after periods of intense competition—

You will recall that these cartels are combinations or trusts, groups of persons in one particular industry seeking to have control of the production and sale of the particular product of interest to this group of persons. This movement has gone so far in Germany that they actually have a cartel court to deal with such trade combinations.

In Europe they deal with the matter differently than we do. Instead of preventing these combinations, they permit the combinations, under strict regulations. Here, whenever we speak about permitting combinations of capital, there is always resentment if we talk about regulation at the same time; but there, there has been that submission to regulation which has justified the Government in permitting the combinations to exist.

Quoting again from Mr. Reagan:

Although in general European international cartels have been formed after periods of intense competition, the nitrogen negotiations are rather unique, in that the French are willing to discuss with the Germans and other European producers ways and means of avoiding the competition anticipated, particularly by the Germans upon the fulfillment of the broad production program planned by France. * * *

Some of the details of this agreement have already been made available. Its aims include at least three of the ones general to international ententes, namely, price agreements, protection of the home markets, and a division of foreign markets.

One of the reasons why I am calling this to the attention of the Senate is that we may be alive to the fact that these combinations are taking place. Unless we can work out some plan or have some understanding as to our participation in such arrangements, or have an understanding with the Attorney General's office about how we may permit these partnerships to take place between representatives of great industries and American capital if we do not work out some such plan, we will find pretty soon that our markets are absorbed by the combinations effected in France, in Germany, and in Belgium.

Mr. Reagan points out:

It is understood, for example, that the French interests will act as the sales agents for the Germans in Spain, while the German agents will handle French dyes in the Far East. * * *

* * * * * * *

This is a brief outline of the conditions and tendencies in the French chemical industry at the present time as viewed from the outside. But, traveling back to France and looking across at our industry in the United States, the question might well be raised, "How does the industry there look upon our industry over here?" In public talks and in private conversations there is one outstanding attitude of the leaders of the industry in France in this regard: This is the feeling repeatedly expressed, that in the international cartels now being formed American participation is vitally essential to their success. This has been expressed particularly as regards dyestuffs, nitrogen, and phosphates.

The report on the situation of the German chemical industry was made by Mr. William T. Daugherty, trade commissioner at Berlin. He presented this report at this meeting of executives of the chemical industry on the 16th of February.

This I find to be a very interesting report worthy of our attention. Mr. Daugherty speaks in detail of the cartel court, which I have already mentioned. Then he says this:

It was announced recently that the German Dye Trust had concluded an agreement with Kuhlmann on dyes—

Kuhlmann is the great French dye concern—calculated to regulate intertrading in dyes produced by the two, particularly to divide export markets. Under this arrangement the Germans probably acquire 80 per cent of exports of dyes by the two parties while the French get the other 20 per cent.

This arrangement is to divide the world into zones, and to determine which nation, the French or the German or the Belgian nation, should take possession of the market in a particular zone. Mr. Daugherty continues:

These two agreements stand out in particular relief, first, because they represent a drift toward an economic entente cordiale between the two bitterest enemies of the late war, and, secondly, because they set the stage for other agreements with other countries. There are many of the latter already, although nothing much has been said or printed about them. They refer to price fixing and even production allocation agreements on specific chemicals.

Then Mr. Daugherty speaks about the Anglo-German combination, saying:

Though deadlocked for the time being, it can be little doubted that eventually an agreement will be reached between the German Dye Trust and Imperial Chemicals, in England. It would appear that such an agreement, as in the case of its predecessors, especially the Franco-German dye and potash agreements, would also be confined to specific products and not to the entirety of production of both trusts. A likely subject for bargaining, for instance, would be dyes.

Then Mr. Daugherty speaks about the nitrogen production and says:

It may be predicted that by 1930 the Germans will be fixing 1,000,000 tons of primary nitrogen annually.

Think of a million tons of nitrogen, when we are doing nothing in that particular!

For some reason or other there has been a disposition to halt the production of ammonium sulphate in Germany, although, as Mr. Daugherty says, "German farmers prefer ammonium sulphate for potato fertilizing and are indifferent by preference between ammonium sulphate and Chile saltpeter for grain fertilizing. It is a fact that ammonium sulphate is preferred on rice, the world's largest crop, grown under conditions of excessive moisture."

Mr. Daugherty points out the distress of the Germans over the suggestion of the press that there has been a disposition in Germany to oppose the best interests of the American chemical industry, and he indicates the desire of the Germans to pass over to us, so far as may be, by enlisting American capital, the production in America of these various chemical products.

I have already spoken of the difficulties in the way of such combinations and partnerships by reason of the fear that the legal authority, the Attorney General's office, might upset the whole arrangement. So, lastly, I want to call attention to the address made by Col. William J. Donovan, assistant to the Attorney General, before this American Chemical Industry Conference on the 16th of February. He clears up this mooted question as to whether or not there would be any disturbance on the part of our Government, or of the administration, of any such arrangement between representatives of the cartels of Europe and American business men who might desire to invest their money in such enterprises. I quote from Mr. Donovan:

Within its own jurisdiction a foreign government may, of course, evolve a trade policy that is directly opposed to our own. If, as a result of that policy, there is established a governmentally controlled monopoly, and that monopoly comes to our shores to engage in trade and conforms with our laws, we can not deny such monopoly the right to do business here. We can not attack the origin of that concern and assert that, because in its inception it was a monopoly, we can, therefore, deny it the right of entry to this country. It came into being as the result of an act of a sovereign power, and, as Mr. Justice Holmes said in the American banana case, "the very meaning of sovereignty is that the decree of the sovereign makes law." Of course, that is a sound principle, because international relations would be disrupted if the courts of one sovereign were permitted to question the legality of the acts of another sovereign state.

So Colonel Donovan makes clear that there is and can be no legal objection to partnerships such as I have suggested between expert scientific knowledge brought to us from some country abroad and the investment in such enterprises as I have mentioned of American capital. I think that that has a very important relationship to the future of America as regards fertilizer development and the development of other great economic activities in America.

We must live in commercial peace with the other nations of the world or we must expect retaliatory legislation in an economic war. Tariffs and discriminatory statutes, with debts and reparations, are international issues. The peace of the world is involved. The voice of commerce freed from royal and imperial restraint and intrigues is far more potent to-day than the voice of politics. Political policies must yield to the needs of the people and must represent the people's desires.

The people of America desire an end to war animosities and a peace of prosperity in which all may join.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed at this point in the RECORD the addresses of William T. Daugherty, Daniel J. Reagan, and William J. Donovan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GERMAN CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

By William T. Daugherty, trade commissioner at Berlin, delivered before second meeting of executives of the chemical industry under the auspices of the Department of Commerce; sessions in national council chamber, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, 1615 H Street NW., February 16, 1928

ECONOMIC SITUATION

Briefly summarized, the economic situation in Germany is characterized by a recovery of industrial production in 1927 that exceeded pre-war in like areas in many cases, although the visible adverse trade balance was 3,350,000,000 marks, or $800,000,000 last year.

Production of pig iron in 1927 was 13,000,000 tons against 11,500,000 in 1913 in comparable areas; coal production of 153,600,000 tons exceeded an output of 140,000,000 tons in present areas; and a 1927 potash production of 1,300,000 tons pure potash breaks the 1922 record of 1,290,000. Chemical production has shifted, of course, since the war, a dyestuffs production of some 80,000 tons now against probably 135,000 tons before the war being compensated for by production of a new synthetic nitrogen industry and other branches. Germany is producing some 700,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually now—of which 310,000 tons is fixed in ammonium sulphate, 320,000 tons in synthetic nitrates, and the rest, 70,000 tons nitrogen, in calcium cyanamide. Compare with this barely 15,000 tons of synthetic fixed nitrogen production in 1913 and 110,000 tons in coke plant by-product sulphate. The Dye Trust can produce at its methanol layout at the Leunawerke about 20,000 tons annually, but is not producing more than from 10,000 to 15,000 tons, according to demand, by virtue of its agreement with the wood distillers. The Leunawerke calculates to produce 100,000 tons of synthetic gasoline this year in its new lignite hydrogenation operation, also at the Leunawerke. It is a striking circumstance that despite an investment of many millions of dollars in its synthetic nitrogen industry, for fertilizer, German crops are far less in per hectare yield than in immediate pre-war years. The 1927 rye crop was only 6,800,000 tons against 12,200,000 in 1913; the wheat crop 3,300,000 tons against 4,600,000; and potatoes, 37,500,000 tons against 54,000,000. An explanation of this unfavorable comparison will be touched upon later.

The unemployment situation is not entirely satisfactory at the present time, there being some 1,300,000 jobless receiving doles, although this comparatively high figure is due to seasonal influences paralyzing the building trades and agriculture chiefly. The figure, however, compares favorably with peak unemployment of 2,000,000 in March, 1926.

A healthy economic symptom, furthermore, is in the fact that bankruptcies are below pre-war. With fewer bankruptcies and less unemployed better times are reflected, of course, despite the heavy adverse trade balance.

The latter is partly accounted for by the fact that Germany has been diverting part of its loans borrowed abroad to financing imports. Germany has borrowed more than 10,000,000,000 marks since the Dawes plant went into effect. This figure was so impressive that it prompted the agent general for reparations, who recently filed his report for the third reparations year, to caution Germany to restrict its foreign borrowing. This opinion is concurred in by Doctor Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, who further emphasizes that borrowed funds should be put to productive use within Germany, rather than for financing imports of foodstuffs and manufactured lines; Doctor Curtius, economics minister, is somewhat more optimistic and concludes that Germany's foreign obligations are relatively low—that is, over 3,000,000,000 marks annually, of which 2,500,000,000 marks are reparations and 750,000,000 marks interest and amortization on loans. His conclusion seems to minimize the unfavorable trade balance, just mentioned, of over 3,000,000,000 marks in 1927.

CARTELS

The cartel, as an association of producers to regulate production, allocate markets, and to fix prices, but preeminently to pool sales of members, is a peculiarly German institution in origin and history. The German chemical industry is essentially sensitive to cartellization by virtue of its susceptibility to overproduction.

Virtually all German producers of chemicals, whether they have bromine, benzol, superphosphate, creosote oil, paints, or lacquers, or one might continue with an endless list, are associated in a horizontal cartel, selling for the group and allocating profits accordingly. When a cartel combines producers of varying production costs it protects the weak against the strong. Consider the chemical bromine, for instance. The German bromine syndicate, to my own knowledge, has one member potentially able to produce this product from carnalite waste liquors at no more than 50 pfennigs per kilogram. It costs other cartel members more, but the net result is that the market price is 3 marks, or around 75 cents per kilogram. Again, German cyanamide producers doubtless operate at more cost than Haber-Bosch, manufacturers, but cyanamide, pooled in the nitrogen syndicate, is priced at 7 pfennigs per kilogram less than Haber-Bosch production.

POTASH SYNDICATE

A somewhat unique German cartel is the much-advertised potash syndicate. This cartel, like the Ruhr coal syndicate, is created by law. It combines all producers and the law specifies that production be allocated. To meet competition, however, the potash syndicate has gone through a process of comparatively intensive concentration in the past two or three years. It has closed down the more unproductive of 228 potential potash shafts in Germany and is operating about 60. An important circumstance, as far as the American consumer is concerned, is that closed-down shafts are compensated under the law, thus burdening the price of potash to the consumer accordingly. This item may cost the cartel between 50 and 70 million marks annually, while the industry's annual obligations under the reparations plan and interest and amortization on its $75,000,000 loan burdens the industry with a total of some half a million marks indebtedness. It is thus not difficult to understand the allegation that German potash production costs are higher than French (Alsatian), though German costs are potentially lower, if competition were open, and the best 17 or more German potash shafts could be thrown into competition with the 17 Alsatian shafts with their high-percentage sylvinite, the latter resulting probably from one natural crystallization when salts now in Alsatian deposits were carried down in floods of the Tertiary geologic period and crystallized out. One can conservatively estimate that 12 of Germany's best potash mines, under conditions of free competition, could meet world demand for cheaper potash and by-products. The latter include magnesium chloride, magnesium sulphate, sodium sulphate, and bromine. These by-products can not be obtained from French deposits, because the latter are exclusively sylvinitic. A potential advantage of no mean importance also is the fact that sulphate salts in German potash deposits obviate the use of relatively expensive sulphuric acid to produce artificial sulphates.

CARTEL COURT

It has been mentioned that the German potash syndicate is created by law. This exempts this combination from decisions of the so-called cartel court, located in Leipzig. This institution was created by order of November, 1923, as is calculated to repress vicious cartel tendencies, most marked in cases by efforts of stronger cartel members to repress the weaker. The cartel court also calculates to prevent the cartels from unjustifiable price inflation at public expense and can consider and render decisions on complaints from consumers. It can penalize the cartels for cutting down production. Another function it has is to permit a cartel member to withdraw from a cartel if he can show proof that his cartel is guilty of practices detrimental to general economic welfare. Authority to repress cartels opposed to the general economic welfare invests this court with rather broad powers, but experience has shown so far that its decisions are more repressive than of effect to actually dissolve the cartels.

The Government also has to a certain extent certain supervisory powers, vis-à-vis, the cartel court, and can make special decisions and refer irregularities to it.

The place of government in relation to German industry generally is more paternalistic than otherwise and, as generally known, it exercises supervisory functions in cartels created by law, such as the potash and coal syndicates. It is also invested to a certain extent in some German industries.

DYE TRUST

The horizontal cartel has led all the way through to complete mergers, as exemplified most strikingly in the case of the world-famous German Dye Trust, with an interesting subsidiary cartel, namely, the nitrogen syndicate, a self-styled ideal cartel, intent on price reductions to boost sales of a product that may soon attain a point of market saturation if production is increased as rapidly as seemingly planned.

Respective members of the present dye trust first associated in 1905 when Cassella, Hoechster, and Kalle formed a group, known as the Triple Association, or Dreiverband. At the same time, Badische, Bayer, and Agfa associated in the so-called Triple Union, or Dreibund. In 1916, both groups associated in the so-called "extended" trust, or community of interests, and in 1917, Griesheim-Elektron, producing dyestuffs intermediates chiefly, entered it. This association allocated production in plants best equipped to manufacture specific chemicals for the pool; it naturally controlled price fixing, and shared profits, the Badische, Bayer, and Hoechster plants, by reason of their output, each getting 25 per cent profit share while the other 25 per cent was split up between Cassella, Kalle, Agfa, and Weiler-ter-Meer.

In late 1925, a complete merger of all into one company was approved. Griesheim has developed more importance in the pool, and is doubtless profiting accordingly, under the present arrangement. It is now generally known that Griesheim held up the then negotiations for a complete merger with demands for a greater profit share.

The scope of the dye trust may be gauged from the fact that it is estimated that it produces now one-third of Germany's entire chemical productions, employs one-fourth of all chemical labor (some 88,000 persons), and controls over 60 per cent of the capital of all German chemical corporations.

INTERNATIONAL

Being the largest consolidation within the German chemical industry, the German dye trust is thus fitted to present a solid front in treating with similar consolidations abroad. Its most outstanding prototypes in Europe are Imperial Chemicals Industries (Ltd.), of England, and Etablissements Kuhlmann, of France, both in turn being mergers.

It was announced recently that the German Dye Trust had concluded an agreement with Kuhlmann on dyes, calculated to regulate intertrading in dyes produced by the two, but particularly to divide export markets. Under this arrangement, the Germans probably acquire 80 per cent of exports of dyes by the two parties, while the French get the other 20 per cent. It was agreed that exports would be proportionate to respective production. It may be estimated fairly closely that while the Germans are producing 75,000 to 80,000 tons of dyestuffs annually, the French produce 15,000 to 20,000 tons.

The Franco-German dye pact, concluded last month, recalls a parallel agreement between these two nations, finally ratified in December, 1926, dividing potash export markets in the ratio of 70 per cent to Germany and 30 per cent to France.

These two agreements stand out in particular relief, first, because they represent a drift toward an economic entente cordiale between the two bitterest enemies of the late war, and secondly, because they set the stage for other agreements with other countries. There are many of the latter already, although nothing much has been said or printed about them. They refer to price fixing and even production-allocation agreements on specific chemicals. The Germans quite recently framed such an agreement with the Austrians and the Czechs, principally on alum and its salts, and on certain ammoniates. A dye-sales arrangement is also in effect between the German Dye Trust and the Spanish. A nitrogen-sales arrangement on oriental markets exists between the Germans and British. For quite some time, special price and market division agreements have been in effect between German and British producers on benzol, borax, creosote oil, and Glauber salts, among other products.

In viewing the effect of these agreements it is well to consider that while they refer specially to price uniformity, and in cases to allocation of production—to combat inevitable overproduction—they are aimed especially at savings on freight hauls; the freight rate on heavy chemicals being particularly burdensome. Thus, if the Germans and Austrians agree to allocate markets on certain chemicals, it stands to reason that the Austrians would sell the Near East, while Germany would sell its surrounding territory. In a recent conversation with Doctor Hueb, who wished to illustrate this point, he put the question: "Why do you Americans sell ammonium sulphate to Japan, and then turn around and buy the same product from us over a tariff of $5 a ton?

ANGLO-GERMAN

Though deadlocked for the time being, it can be little doubted that eventually an agreement will be reached between the German Dye Trust and Imperial Chemicals, in England. It would appear that such an agreement, as in the case of its predecessors, especially the Franco-German dye and potash agreements, would also be confined to specific products and not to the entirety of production of both trusts. A likely subject for bargaining, for instance, would be dyes. The British could conceivably welcome German technique in dyestuffs production in exchange for a share of British and Colonial markets. This arrangement was proposed in negotiations between 1922 and 1924, but was finally vetoed by the British Government. Apparently the fear still remains in Britain that the German Dye Trust inclines to demanding the lion's share in such an arrangement and that the British dyestuffs industry might thus come under Teutonic domination.

NITROGEN

Another likely subject for bargaining between the German Dye Trust and not only the British but other countries is nitrogen. An agreement on nitrogen would seem unavoidable in view of threatening overproduction. It may be predicated that by 1930 the Germans will be fixing 1,000,000 tons of primary nitrogen annually, when the Leunawerke of the Dye Trust are further expanded and some other new units, particularly the Mont-Cenis process (at Sodingen), utilizing coke-oven gas hydrogen, goes into full operation of 100,000 tons nitrogen annually. Only last year the German Dye Trust made a pact with the Norwegian Norsk Hydro arc process plant, and acquired a substantial portfolio of its shares. This act made the Germans part owners, with the French, of the Norwegian plant. Production at the latter will be doubled.

On the other hand, the Dye Trust has shown itself indisposed so far to treat with Chile producers, although I am informed the latter have approached the German nitrogen syndicate with offers for an agreement, probably on production, prices, and markets.

It may be of interest to note in passing that the German Dye Trust has pegged its production of ammonium sulphate and will produce no greater quantity of this particular salt, but will increase production of nitrates, especially calcium nitrate, as a substitute, though hydroscopic, for Chile saltpeter. It has been mentioned that the nitrogen syndicate now claims a total production of 700,000 tons fixed nitrogen.

Halting of ammonium sulphate production by the Dye Trust may confirm adverse criticism, uttered often enough, against this fertilizer on account of its acid. Nevertheless, best opinion of fertilizer scientists in Germany does not share the one-sided view of ammonium sulphate expressed by its opponents. German farmers prefer ammonium sulphate for potato fertilizing and are indifferent by preference between ammonium sulphate and Chile saltpeter for grain fertilizing. It is a fact that ammonium sulphate is preferred on rice, the world's largest crop, grown under conditions of excessive moisture. This is all predicated on the assumption that sufficient limestone is evident in the soil as a neutralizing agent against inevitable soil acidification aggravated by ammonium sulphate.

Nevertheless and despite the enormous investment in synthetic nitrogen in Germany, the crop yields are less than pre-war per hectare yield. The Prussian Chamber of Agriculture, however, concludes that less nitrogen in artificial and manure carriers is being returned to German soil now than before the war, despite the doubling of artificial nitrogen fertilizer tonnage for fertilizer, i. e., 400,000 tons nitrogen now against 200,000 tons nitrogen in pre-war. In reaching this conclusion it is pointed out not only has German livestock been decimated since the war but, more important, imports of high-grade fodders have fallen off, causing an absolute nitrogen shortage compared with pre-war. Furthermore, only one-third the limestone is being used as fertilizer that was used before the war, with the result that one-fourth of German soils are acid. Too little phosphoric acid is being used, while the weather has been particularly adverse in postwar years, except 1925, while the immediate pre-war years were favored with exceptionally fine crop weather. And postwar crops may be underestimated, German farmers thus attempting to dodge the income tax.

OIL FROM COAL

Another possible point of contact between European chemical producers is offered by the new process hydrogenating low-grade coals, pioneer research on which was done by Dr. Friedrich Bergius, of Heidelberg, but which was improved by the German Dye Trust, which supplied a catalyst to the operation. It seems to be too optimistic to suppose that this oil from coal will emancipate Germany entirely from petroleum imports in future. Its first years of production can scarcely overhaul increasing consumption by the automotive industry alone in Germany. Furthermore, lignite reserves for raw material for the synthesis are not inexhaustible. Under the ammonia operation alone lignite reserves were estimated to last but another 100 years, and since then the oil from coal synthesis and the fact that hydrogen will be produced over lignite instead of coke will cut into these reserves all the sooner. Incidentally much of the secret of the Leunawerke's capacity to throw its synthetic production of ammonia, methanol, and oil from coal into world competition doubtless depends upon its future plans to produce hydrogen from lignite instead of coke. The former costs about 75 cents per ton on the spot, while coke, hauled from the Ruhr, must cost them in the neighborhood of $10 a ton. The Leunawerke's coke bill has always been a most expensive item.

German rights to the coal-hydrogenation process center in the so-called Kobergin Co., 65 per cent of whose shares belong to the Dye Trust, while Ges. f. Teerverwertung holds the rest. The latter is putting up a Bergin plant in the Ruhr. Foreign rights center in the Internatitonal Bergin Co., of The Hague, which has recently licensed to a British syndicate rights to promote the process further.

CONCLUSION

German Dye Trust officials have been considerably exercised of late by press reports that their chemical industry calculated to consolidate for the particular purpose of opposing the best interests of the American chemical industry. While it is not the purpose of this discussion to reach any definite conclusions on this controversial issue—and granted that the effects of European consolidations have an unavoidable reaction on world competition—I can quote certain leading figures of the German Dye Trust who deny first that they are out to fight the American chemical industry, and, secondly, that the Dye Trust has bought heavily into shares of the American chemical industry. They emphasize on the other hand that it is their wish to frame agreements with elements in the American chemical industry as far as this is possible and cite as proof of this at least three German-American agreements arrived at in the past year. They indicate also that further special agreements with American chemical and related companies are in sight. All of this is substantially contained in an official statement given by Dr. Carl Bosch, of the Dye Trust, to an American financial paper, which carried his interview a few days ago.

Before leaving Berlin last month, I was told substantially the same thing by Doctor Bueb, the Dye Trust's leading figure in that city, and he stated further that if accurate information were wanted concerning the Dye Trust's plans in connection with international tie-ups, either he or Doctor Bosch would welcome questions from any responsible American firm, association, or individual.

The Dye Trust's brief of argument is, of course, that rationalization, begun after the inflation period in Germany, is now being sought internationally in the interest of lowering costs by combating overproduction by allocating markets, and it follows that such arrangements involve price fixing. This effort is only in its beginning now and the future may bring forth the many significant international associations.

THE FRENCH CHEMICAL INDUSTRY—TENDENCIES TOWARD CENTRALIZATION AND CARTEL PARTICIPATION

By Daniel J. Reagan, assistant commercial attaché at Paris. Delivered before the second meeting of executives of the chemical industry, under the auspices of the Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C., February 16, 1928

It has been suggested by members of the chemical advisory committee and representatives of the industry that a discussion of the chemical situation within France might develop briefly three points: A broad view of the industry as a whole, recent developments, and the present condition of the industry, and finally the movement toward centralization within France and combinations with foreign interests.

The French chemical industry, following its effort, since the war, to become self-contained, and which aim it has achieved in several branches, is now characterized by a decided trend toward consolidation of interests, foreign penetration, and cooperation with foreign producers in its export trade.

Despite the remarkable development which has occurred during the war and since the armistice, the capital involved compared with the outlay here in the United States, is relatively very small. The nominal capital invested in approximately 40 companies in 1914, amounted to 310,000,000 francs or $62,000,000. The negotiable value of these shares at that time was double that amount. At the beginning of 1928 the nominal capital of these same companies approximated 1,300,000,000 francs, or, on a gold basis, only $52,000,000, but whose negotiable value was equivalent to almost six and one-half billion francs, or $260,000,000. Unfortunately, the bonded indebtedness of these companies in the prewar period is not available, although at the present time the nominal value of such issues is equivalent to $17,000,000, or one-third of the present nominal capitalization.

In this capital development, the expansion of the individual companies has, of course, not been uniform. This is particularly true of the four companies which lead as regards capital. These companies are: The Kuhlmann Co., which is now the largest from the point of view of capital and variety of products; St. Gobain, which is the principal producer of heavy chemicals, glass, and the superphosphates; Alais, Froges et Camargue, commonly known as Pechiney, the dominant electrochemical company in France; and the Nitrogenous & Composite Fertilizer Co. Taken as a whole, the capital outlay of these four companies, which represented 50 per cent of the total investment in the industry in 1914, has now been increased to 60 per cent. As for the increase by these individual companies the last of the companies just named has increased its capital by only 50 per cent, while the expansion of the Kuhlmann Co., for example, has brought the nominal value of its present stock to thirty-six times that of 1914.

This increased capital expended for new plant equipment and for the development of products not before manufactured, has been applied particularly to the dyestuffs industry, and more recently to the synthetic nitrogen industry, as well as to those using nitrocellulose as a base, such as the rayon, celluloid, and pyroxylin lacquer industries.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE INDUSTRY

The World War brought to the attention of the industrial and political leaders of France the acute need for making France self-sufficient as regards chemical resources and equipment. In certain groups and in particular products France was already self-contained before the war. This was true for phosphates and superphosphates; for such basic materials as sulphuric acid and hydrochloric acid; for bauxite for its aluminum industry; for glass, and for a wide range of other finished chemical products such as pharmaceuticals and perfumery. With the return of Alsace, sufficient potash resources were obtained. As regards dyes, a very strenuous effort and Government cooperation in controlling imports brought from Germany have been required to bring this branch into a position where it is considered to be strong enough for both peace and war-time needs. With no natural nitrate resources, France has for years been struggling to develop a synthetic industry for this product, but this development has been so slow that it will undoubtedly be a number of years before those demanding complete self-sufficiency will be satisfied in this field. Because of the rapid strides of the rayon, pyroxylin lacquer and film industries in France, the fear of a lack of a sufficient quantity of nitrocellulose is no longer discussed. This is not true, however, for liquid fuels as France now produces less than 7 per cent of her total needs and is conducting extensive research to develop synthetic carburants.

The commercial equilibrium deranged during the period of currency fluctuation, which lasted until the fall of 1926, has been gradually restored. The franc, as is well known, has been practically stable throughout 1927, and this has aided materially in effecting price readjustments and in enabling production schedules to be adapted to more normal domestic and foreign sales.

From a fiscal point of view, at least for several of the larger companies whose preliminary reports are available, a reduction in net income running as high as 10 per cent when compared with 1926 is indicated, but considering the currency appreciation even these returns have been more favorable when converted to a gold basis.

The question of costs and prices which was very troublesome at the beginning of the year is no longer acute. Many manufacturers who had acquired large stocks of raw materials during the period of heaviest inflation in 1926 felt a natural chagrin during the first quarter or half of 1927 while they worked off these stocks and saw the wholesale prices for these materials declining appreciably. At the same time retail prices followed the normal phenomenon of declining more slowly, with the result that living costs were slow to return to a satisfactory basis and wages naturally could not be reduced. Producers of chemical products were forced, however, to grant price concessions in order to approximate the world level, and this, in the face of their high costs, prevented a more satisfactory showing on their balance sheets despite the fact that production, consumption, and foreign trade compared favorably with 1926 and in some departments registered favorable increases.

This equilibrium between production, consumption and foreign trade has been particularly true of the heavy chemical branch of the industry. The heavy mineral acids industry has enjoyed a normal year since most of the consuming industries maintained the volume of manufacture of the preceding year.

The alkali branch of this industry has enjoyed a normal year. The production of soda products was maintained on the level of 1926.

As for nitrogen production the output of 1927 was larger in volume than in 1926 but still meets only 45 per cent of the local needs. The major portion of the domestic consumption is still met by Chilean nitrates and synthetic products imported from Germany, but the French output of artificial nitrates is increasing although not as rapidly as was hoped for. This disappointment is a result largely of the delay in the Government-owned Toulouse plant where almost $12,000,000 have already been spent since the construction program was laid down after the acquisition of the Haber process in 1919. Production there was begun only last summer, and the maximum output in any month has not exceeded 500 tons of ammonium sulphate.

As an instance of the penetration of American technical development in France may be noted the recent sale of the American process for manufacturing phosphoric acid by the electric-furnace process. These rights were purchased by the Tunisian Phosphate Co. which will employ this process in the Pyrenees while using phosphates from its own mines in North Africa.

Despite the marked increase in the output of North African phosphates particularly in the government owned mines of Morocco, the United States still maintains a large clientele in Europe because of the high quality of its phosphates. The strongest competition in Europe of American phosphates is, of course, the Cherifian Phosphate Office which operates the Morocco mines for the French Government. The private producers of Algeria and Tunisia, on their side, continue to complain of the competition which they still meet from these government-owned mines, and some way is being sought to protect these private enterprises from the government-subsidized mines.

American producers have recently become interested in the arrival in the United States of several cargoes of Moroccan phosphates. Observers of the phosphate situation throughout the world are watching this movement very closely in an effort to determine whether these shipments which it is claimed were sold below prices in the United States will likely involve a threat to invade the American market on a large scale, or whether these sales are designed to bring about some possible form of American cooperation in the European market.

The shock of the war brought to France the realization that the dye and synthetic organic chemical industries had been neglected to the detriment of the national welfare. For example, in the last year before the war, France imported 90 per cent of its total dyestuff needs. The expansion program in this industry, fostered by the Government, and carried out particularly by the two principal French producers, the Kuhlmann and the St. Denis companies, has gained special headway in recent years both as regards the actual tonnage and the variety of dyes produced. The result has been that the position of the French dyestuff industry as compared with the pre-war situation has become more than satisfactory; instead of producing only 10 per cent of her needs, France now produces 95 per cent and enjoys a favorable balance in its foreign trade in this category of chemical products.

The impetus for an increased production of dyes in France was crystallized in 1919 by the formation of the Producers and Consumers Dyestuff Union which controlled imports from Germany and encouraged the French producers to carry out the development program already visualized by them. With this united body protecting and fostering their interests, the French dyestuff manufacturers have greatly expanded their facilities until in 1927 their output totaled more than 16,000 tons. Following this development this industry is now taking steps to centralize its forces at home and to consolidate its foreign markets by international agreements.

The effort to become self-contained in the chemical industry in France is obvious also in other branches. The manufacture of rayon, for example, has doubled from 3,700 tons in 1923 to approximately 7,500 tons in 1927. In the gas industry, despite the destruction of many plants in the Nord and Pas de Calais, coal basins, the pre-war output has already been surpassed and particularly as regards coke, coal, tar, sulphate of ammonia, pitch, benzol, and other coal-tar derivatives.

The production of inflammable film stock in France in 1926 totaled 34,000,000 meters, but only 20,000,000 meters in 1927; in contrast with this was the sharp increase in the production of noninflammable film stock from 11,000,000 meters in 1926 to 20,000,000 meters in 1927.

There has been similar development in a number of other specific products, but in such major branches as nitrogen and synthetic fuels, France has not yet become independent of foreign supplies.

TENDENCIES TOWARD CENTRALIZATION WITHIN FRANCE AND TOWARD INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

The rapid expansion in capital and plant equipment in France since the beginning of the war has made France self-contained, as we have seen, as regards such groups of products as fertilizers, except nitrates, dyestuffs, rayon, and a long list of other individual commodities. The struggle to achieve this independence has, until recently, been carried on along individualistic lines, but there is apparent now a distinct trend toward centralization within France and toward cooperation with producers abroad in their foreign-sales policy. This movement is now being manifested in three distinct ways: By exchange of stock holdings and company mergers, by centralizing the powers of the chemical-trade associations, and by participation in international cartels.

The extent of the first of these three movements, namely, company amalgamation and exchange of capital holdings, is obviously difficult to determine. This is evidenced, however, in the case of the Kuhlmann Co. in its participation in 12 different French concerns representing a broad variety of products including raw materials, heavy chemicals, dyestuffs, synthetic products, paper, and rayon. The capitalization represented by these companies is equivalent to almost half of the capitalization of the Kuhlmann Co. itself. It controls, or has large holdings also, in six foreign companies involving the production of fertilizers, synthetic products, and dyestuffs. Through its association with the St. Clair du Rhone Dyestuffs Co., and with a Swiss manufacturing company at St. Fons, the Kuhlmann Co. now controls the production of approximately 70 per cent of the French dyestuffs production.

The dyestuff industry in France has been further unified by the recent exchange of a block of shares between the Kuhlmann Co. and the second largest dyestuffs producer, its strongest domestic competitor, the St. Denis Co., which accounts for 30 per cent of the French output. This exchange, it is understood, grew out of the need to present a unified front in the negotiations which terminated successfully in the formation of the recent Franco-German dyestuffs accord.

In the pharmaceutical field, Poulenc Freres and the Usines du Rhone, the two largest producers in this branch of the industry, originally planned an exchange of a large block of shares of each company, but, faced with a situation analogous to that which confronted the German I. G. in its reorganization, this has been held up because of the heavy tax involved in such a transfer. At a recent meeting of one of these companies, however, it was announced that a working agreement which might be considered as effective as the proposed exchange of stock had been arranged. Besides direct amalgamations or the purchase of control and exchange of stock, the common interests of a number of companies are cared for by an exchange of directors on the various boards.

Another instance of activity in common, now becoming very usual in France, is the agreement to participate in the use of a given process as in the recent arrangement which Kuhlmann made with the Anzin and with the Marles coal mines to produce jointly synthetic ammonia. The Kuhlmann Co. is now also entering the rayon industry through an agreement with two of the established textile companies. This new company will be controlled by the Kuhlmann organization and will be supplied with raw materials which it itself produces. In this connection it is interesting to note that the portion of the capital for this company put up by the Kuhlmann Co. was obtained by a recent stock issue of 50,000,000 francs, one-half of which was privately underwritten by an American bond house which obtained these shares at approximately two-thirds of their present market value.

The St. Gobian Co. has also recently extended its affiliations with a number of companies, as have several of the other larger concerns.

ASSOCIATION DEVELOPMENTS

This movement toward centralization of capital and equipment in the chemical industry in France has been paralleled recently by the establishment of a greater unity of power through trade associations.

There have long been established trade associations for the individual chemical commodity groups as well as a union of these various forces. It developed, however, during the preliminary discussion between France and Germany looking toward a commercial treaty and tariff changes that this union was somewhat unwieldy in its organization and a movement was started which resulted finally in the establishment of a "central committee" representing practically all of the important chemical companies in France and which was empowered to represent these industries in the discussions with the Government on commercial treaties and tariff matters and which, furthermore, was detailed to deal with the question of ententes with foreign producers. This organization was found to be very effective in the Franco-German commercial treaty negotiations as well as in the discussions which culminated in the dye entente between the I. G. and the French producers. This central committee is further divided into committees representing the specific commodity groups and all these committees work with the French Government in bringing about a tariff schedule acceptable to the various branches. Obviously, the negotiations with the Germans for the dye entente were headed by the committee which represented the big three in the French dyestuffs industry.

Parallel with the establishment of this central committee in France, four of the principal Belgian manufacturers have likewise formed a chemical union in that country to represent their interests in matters similar to those dealt with by the French committee. This step by the Belgians is looked upon in well-informed quarters as the prelude to participation in certain of the other European chemical ententes now under discussion.

There has not been a broad development of common sales offices for the domestic market in France as there has been in Germany, but several of these offices are already in operation, such as the Comptoir de L'Azote, which is the common sales office for the nitrogen manufacturers and which also distributes German nitrogenous products received on reparations accounts and which also is representing the French producers in the current entente negotiations. In the potash industry it is well known that the products from the private as well as the Government mines are sold through a common office. The phenomenal increase in the production of phosphates in Morocco under Government direction—from 8,000 tons in 1921 to 1,200,000 tons in 1927—has forced a movement on the part of the private owners in Algeria and Tunisia to coordinate the sales of all of the North African mines, to divide the markets, and to work out a price agreement which will protect their interest. As part of this plan it has been proposed that the Algerian and Tunisian Governments set aside one franc for each ton mined to be matched by the Moroccan Government and that the same amount be set aside by each of the individual producers and that this total fund be used for propaganda to stimulate the use of North African phosphates. It would seem to be only a matter of time until some working arrangement will be achieved between private producers and the Government-owned mines to permit the former to retain their foothold in the European market and to operate with a more equitable profit.

TREND TOWARD PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

While these two movements toward centralization within France are important factors affecting ultimately international markets, of more immediate interest to the chemical industry of the United States is the growing policy of the French chemical industry to cooperate with foreign interests, particularly as regards export sales. The latest example of this policy is, of course, the Franco-German dyestuffs agreement finally signed in December, 1927.

Cartels of this character have in recent years taken on a new significance. Before the war they were considered mostly from an economic point of view, particularly by the innocent consumer, who saw in them a lever for raising prices at his expense to the profit of the combination. Since the war these European accords have acquired a political significance in so far as many seek to readjust the economic derangement brought about by the war and the peace. Because of this the governments concerned have followed closely such efforts to unite economically forces which had been disrupted by political or national considerations. In some instances the governments themselves or political forces within the governments have been sympathetic and helpful and in others they have shown opposition on specific grounds.

An instance of such opposition was the expression of disapproval by a strong political and economic group in France to the formation of the international steel entente on the ground that the rights of the local consumers seemed to enjoy inadequate consideration. This opposition was voiced after the signing of the accord, however, and while it did not affect the terms already laid down it did bring about an understanding among the members of the ententes in the several countries concerned and the consuming groups whereby the latter were assured of adequate supplies at prices acceptable to them.

An example of Government cooperation in the entente movement is to be found in the negotiations which led up to the Franco-German dyestuffs agreement. Both Governments conferred constantly with the negotiating groups and as a prelude to this accord worked hand in hand with the interests of both countries in establishing tariff schedules as a corollary to the commercial treaty and which greatly facilitated the ultimate signature of the private protocol. In a sense, however, it might be more accurate to say that the tariff agreement was made possible since the vital sections for chemicals are understood to have been written practically in the final form by the representatives of the industries of the two countries concerned and then accepted by their Governments.

The well-known Franco-German potash accord is even a more distinct example of European cartel involving political as well as economic considerations. Also the nitrogen negotiations already begun and which may be brought to a head this spring are, of course, of vital importance politically to the European countries involved as well as to their neighbors, and also from the French point of view the attitude of the Government will have added weight because the nitrogen plant at Toulouse designed to produce ultimately 150,000 tons of ammonium sulphate annually is now in partial operation.

These negotiations are now being paralleled by discussions between the French and German pharmaceutical manufacturers, and the leaders of the French chemical industry have expressed the hope also that they may come to an agreement with the members of the European rayon entente, as well as with Germany, looking toward the ultimate production of synthetic petroleum and a division of markets for this product. At the moment France has not developed a process commercially suitable to the type of coal which might be employed economically and it is claimed in French circles that the German process is not readily adaptable to the French coal resources.

Although in general European international cartels have been formed after periods of intense competition, the nitrogen negotiations are rather unique in that the French are willing to discuss with the Germans and other European producers ways and means of avoiding the competition anticipated, particularly by the Germans upon the fulfillment of the broad production program planned by France. Furthermore, while the French have been exporting dyes now for a number of years, it has only been in the last few years that France has achieved a favorable balance in her foreign trade in dyestuffs. It would appear that the policy which permitted the recent agreement was in a sense a prevention of rather than a cure for competition.

Some of the details of this agreement have already been made available. Its aims include at least three of the ones general to international ententes, namely, price agreements, protection of the home markets, and a division of foreign markets. Average exports from 1924 through 1926 have been used as the basis of foreign quotas with Germany to obtain approximately 80 per cent and France 20 per cent of their joint sales. These percentages are not based upon weight but upon the gold value of these exports, and this method obviously has been used because of the wide variety of products of great difference in value on the basis of volume. The accord automatically falls apart if by the end of three years the nitrogen agreement between the two countries has not been reached. The Swiss are now negotiating to enter this entente, if they have not already affixed their signatures, and the percentages of the total exports of these countries to be allotted will probably be 70 for Germany, 19 for Switzerland, and 11 for France. Their participation, of course, will be facilitated by the large holdings both by Kuhlmann and the I. G. in several of the Swiss dye companies. Whether the British producers will eventually enter the accord depends, it appears, upon the attitude of the Government toward the terms offered, and particularly upon the disposition made of the British colonies—that is to say, whether all or part of them would be reserved to Great Britain as part of her home market. (If Great Britain had entered originally, the tentative percentages were to be 75 for Germany, 13 for Great Britain, and 12 for France.)

Just before I came here two weeks ago it was my privilege to have a talk with M. Donat Agache, the president of the Kuhlmann Co., in which we discussed the terms and possible effects of this entente; and M. Agache asked me to state for him that he "considered it the policy of the French chemical industry to promote international peace by effecting international ententes, particularly in the basic branches of the chemical industry, in order to avoid ground for future economic disputes and to promote international development of the key chemical industries."

Some critics within France and in other countries, however, have expressed the fear that this accord may tend to restrict the expected development of the dyestuffs industry in France, and the fear is even stronger that an international entente for nitrates may dwarf that growing industry in France.

It is true that an agreement to establish common sales offices or to allocate certain markets individually either in France or Germany should eliminate competition, at least between these two groups. It is understood, for example, that the French interests will act as the sales agents for the Germans in Spain, while the German agents will handle French dyes in the Far East.

The price-agreement factor is, of course, of vital interest to their competitors in the various foreign markets, and it is possible that this effect is already being felt by the foreign agents of the dye producers here.

This common-price policy will, of course, be partially determined by the economies which may be effected by the terms of this entente. These economies may be roughly stated to result from the expected reduction in stocks which must be carried, since the division of the domestic and foreign markets will obviously permit a closer approximation between production and sales. As a corollary to this, capital savings may be effected through the reduction of equipment required in warehouse facilities and in labor and overhead involved in the manufacturing end.

It is possible, of course, that there may be savings effected in the number of colors carried, which, in the case of Kuhlman, now totals almost 1,500 different types as compared with only 184 colors in 1921; but the major saving is, of course, expected to be derived from the common-sales policy adopted. In a recent press statement M. Agache (of the Kuhlmann Co.) is quoted as saying that "the French producers have been expending 33 per cent of the sales price of dyestuffs for distribution costs, whereas it has now been made possible to reduce this proportion to 15 per cent by instituting a common-sales policy which would permit many savings. This accord in the dyestuffs branch, which represents only a small part of our products, will permit us to concentrate our efforts on other branches of the chemical industry, notably in fertilizers, where it is possible to invest a certain amount of capital more advantageously."

This estimated saving of over 50 per cent in sales and distribution charges could, of course, be made of vital significance in competition in foreign markets. It is, perhaps, this factor which will be watched most closely by the sales agents of the dye manufacturers of other countries throughout the world and no doubt it will raise questions in their minds as to the disposition to be made of this saving. Three alternatives will no doubt occur in this connection:

1. Will all or only a part of these savings be transferred by these companies to their profit balance?

2. Will all or part of these economies be employed for sale promotion, or, as the term is used in France, for propaganda?

3. Will all or part of these savings be passed along to the foreign consumers?

If the answer to the last question is "Yes," and prices are reduced, the effect will be of the utmost importance to the producers in other countries in meeting this competition.

This last question may perhaps be partially answered by an authorized statement from M. Agache which appeared in the French financial paper L'Information, in which he is quoted as saying "this accord, contrary to monopolies which often seek to increase sales prices, should, on the contrary, seek a decrease (in prices), and which should have as its effect the development of consumption and in this way increase also the production of the industries involved."

If such price decreases are effected and consumption and production stimulated, this policy may be the answer to those critics who fear that the growth of the French dyestuffs' industry may be arrested through the signing of this accord, and if it is successful from the French point of view it would not seem unlikely to suppose that the other branches of the French chemical industry will be willing to emphasize more strongly the current trend toward centralization within France and to enter into other ententes for other commodities which are considered basic to the economic development of France.

This is a brief outline of the conditions and tendencies in the French chemical industry at the present time as viewed from the outside. But, traveling back to France and looking across at our industry in the United States, the question might well be raised, "How does the industry there look upon our industry over here?" In public talks and in private conversations there is one outstanding attitude of the leaders of the industry in France in this regard; this is the feeling repeatedly expressed that, in the international cartels now being formed, American participation is vitally essential to their success. This has been expressed particularly as regards dyestuffs, nitrogen, and phosphates, and some authorities go so far as to state that without such participation, sooner or later these cartels must crack, and that the manufacturers in the various European countries would then have to begin again to struggle to advance, or, at least, hold their own in the face of the dominant financial, technical, and organization resources of the American chemical industry, an industry which they regard as stimulated by the idea of industrial individualism and catalysed to release or combine new elements of service and thereby contribute further to the rising standard of living of this country as a whole.

Foreign Cartels and American Industry

ADDRESS BEFORE AMERICAN CHEMICAL INDUSTRY CONFERENCE, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C.

By Col. William J. Donovan, Assistant to the Attorney General, on February 16, 1928. Chemical convention held under auspices of Department of Commerce

You are already informed of the economic and particularly the chemical features of the cartel movement abroad. You recognize that the growth of cartels, as well as combinations and governmental monopolies, is part of the current industrial development of the European Continent.

It is not my purpose to enter into that phase of the discussion. My endeavor will be simply to indicate the view of the Department of Justice concerning its duty toward the operation of these combinations, monopolies, and cartels within the field limited by our laws.

In considering the obligation of the department in relation to these activities, it is essential that we have as our line of departure the organic law upon which the authority of the Federal Government is based.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce, out of which comes its right to enact so-called antitrust statutes, is found in Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution.

That section provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

It was under the authority granted by that provision of the Constitution that the Sherman Act was passed. That act is the primary statute of his country regulating its foreign and interstate commerce. It is declaratory of our national policy in dealing with centralization of power in our commercial and industrial development.

In its substantive features the Sherman law is divided into two parts. Section 1 forbids every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of interstate or foreign commerce. Section 2 forbids monopolies, or attempts to monopolize, in such trade or commerce. The act does not undertake specifically to enumerate particular forbidden restraints. Since its enactment, however, the Supreme Court in various decisions has interpreted its purpose and defined its scope.

So that from the act itself, as well as the decisions, a philosophy of the relation that should exist between business and government, has been evolved. That philosophy is based on practical experience rather than on mere abstraction, and in its application certain limitations and exceptions have been recognized.

The Supreme Court has pointed out that, whether the existence of competition is a wholesome thing for trade and commerce or not, it nevertheless is the settled law of this country that such competition shall exist. The court has asserted that the public convenience and welfare demand that the natural lines of competition be left undisturbed and that the control of prices through combination tends to restraint of trade and monopoly and is an evil thing.

The law recognizes, however, that competition may be carried to an extreme; that it may be destructive; that it may generate evils. Those consolidations which seek only to secure the advantages that come through economical management and do not aim to dominate the particular industry, Congress and the courts recognize as proper and even necessary in our industrial development.

Our policy, then, is based upon the principle of competition. That principle includes the ideas of equal opportunity, maintenance of individual initiative, freedom from governmental regulation, and absence of power to control prices or allot territory or customers. In that respect it differs from the continental theory. That theory advocates not only combination of industrial units but permits the existence of monopoly under close governmental supervision, with power to limit production, allot territory, assign customers, and fix prices.

It is clear, then, that those two theories are in direct conflict; and since the war there has been brought home to us more definitely the effect that such conflict may have upon the industry of this country, not only in its foreign and its neutral markets but as well in its home markets.

It is because of the tendency of the European chemical industry to organize combinations with power to regulate prices, production, markets, and exports that certain representatives of your industry, as well as of others, have felt impelled to call for the amendment of our antitrust laws, so that combinations similar to European combinations may be developed in order that the threatened competition from abroad may be more readily resisted.

It would seem that those who urge such amendments to our laws—amendments permitting combinations in industry resulting in monopoly—forget the historical, inevitable result of such a tendency.

It would mean that the people of this country would not permit monopolistic power to go unregulated. If your industry is permitted to attain that extent of combination which results in elimination of competition, the people of the country, for their own protection, would insist that there should be greater governmental supervision and control. So that those among you who, because of fear of foreign competition, grow panicky and urge what is in effect a surrender to the continental principle of trade ought to pause and consider whether or not there is not greater opportunity for more effective and unhampered development of your industry under our existing laws.

Let us consider, then, the protective measures enacted by Congress which meet the challenge of foreign monopolies and cartels. It is important that this situation be clarified.

The problem presented is a fundamental one. It is important that it be handled without arousing international prejudice and ill will. It is one that is of importance not only to ourselves but to the entire industrial world. It involves the policy that our country should pursue toward a militant movement in international commerce. The intrusion of government into trading operations presents new questions. The establishment of governmental controls of trade in raw materials, of which the nationals of that government produce the major portion of the world's supply, and then, through these controls, arbitrarily fixing prices necessarily presents a serious problem to a country whose economic theory is opposed to any such system.

Within its own jurisdiction a foreign government may, of course, evolve a trade policy that is directly opposed to our own. If, as a result of that policy, there is established a governmentally controlled monopoly, and that monopoly comes to our shores to engage in trade and conforms with our laws, we can not deny such monopoly the right to do business here. We can not attack the origin of that concern and assert that, because in its inception it was a monopoly, we can therefore deny it the right of entry to this country. It came into being as the result of an act of a sovereign power, and as Mr. Justice Holmes said in the American Banana case, "The very meaning of sovereignty is that the decree of the sovereign makes law." Of course, that is a sound principle, because international relations would be disrupted if the courts of one sovereign were permitted to question the legality of the acts of another sovereign state.

But a different situation is presented when a foreign monopoly comes into our jurisdiction and attempts to perform those acts which are forbidden under our law. It is the belief of the Department of Justice that, when a foreign monopoly, though legal in its place of origin, comes into this country, and, by collusion with our citizens, enters into agreements here for the restraint of trade and the enhancement of prices, those agreements are just as illegal and just as much subject to our laws as they would be if the corporations and individuals involved themselves were creatures of our Government. And we believe that it does not constitute a defense to assert that, even if the acts here were illegal, they have become insulated and immunized by the fact that the acts performed abroad were legalized under the laws of a foreign government.

And the basis for that contention is found in the antitrust provisions of the Wilson Tariff Act, which was enacted in 1894. Although passed in that year, its provisions were never invoked until two years ago, and were not passed upon and interpreted by the Supreme Court until 1927. That act deals specifically with the importation of goods. It provides that every contract between two or more persons or corporations, either of whom is engaged in importing any article from any foreign country is illegal and void if it is intended to operate in restraint of trade or designed to increase the market prices in the United States of any article imported or intended to be imported.

In the discussion in Congress at the time of its adoption the reasons for its enactment was clearly brought out. Those in charge of the bill stated that the only way to exclude foreign trusts from this country was by direct and positive legislation preventing them from entering into combinations with capital which would enable the importer to control prices and to monopolize the market. The law was based, as disclosed in debate, upon the principle of preventive justice; that by penalties imposed upon their transactions objectionable combinations would be prevented from imposing heavy burdens upon those who must consume the imported articles.

For the first time that statute was interpreted by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Sisal Sales Corporation, which was decided in May, 1927. The facts in that case were these: Companies in Yucatan secured by means of governmental intervention—legislation and decrees—a monopoly in sisal. Acting jointly with banks in the United States, they organized a sales corporation as exclusive selling agency in the United States. As a result of their plan it was charged that competition in this market was eliminated and excessive prices were arbitrarily fixed.

The court said this was a contract entered into by parties within the United States and made effective by acts done therein; that the fundamental object was the monopolization of importation and sale of sisal; that the essence of the conspiracy was not the acts done by a foreign government within its territory but rather the acts participated in by all the defendants within our jurisdiction. Mr. Justice McReynolds said that such arrangement was plainly within the Wilson Tariff Act; that the parties were within the jurisdiction of our courts, and they could be punished for offenses against our laws.

The Wilson Act so interpreted constitutes a measure of protection against the illegal activities of foreign trusts in our jurisdiction.

So far as it presently appears, the so-called chemical entente and the Franco-German dyestuffs agreement appear to involve no attempt to exploit this market. In fact, we have authentic assurances that these arrangements are not directed against this market. In order, however, to illustrate what I am trying to explain, let us suppose that the dyestuffs agreement is directed toward the exploitation of this market at the expense of our consumers. Let us assume that it is agreed by the German I. G., on the one hand, and the French Kuhlmann interests, on the other hand, that they will participate in American sales on a 50–50 basis. A central selling agency is established. The exploitation is carried on through the agency of American citizens and with the assistance of American banks. American dyestuff manufacturers are bought out or they agree not to undersell the foreign factors. In our judgment, this hypothetical statement presents a clear violation of law on this soil, and not only the American citizens but the foreign companies and their officials could be held for a violation of law.

Now, that is our conception of the law. I ought to say to you, however, that there is a similar case before the courts at this moment. In that case our view has been questioned because the parties include a corporation in which the foreign government has a stock interest. The principle is that no sovereign can be sued without its consent; but the exemption of a sovereign rests only upon the practice of comity or upon international etiquette or courtesy.

It is asserted, however, that because the majority of the stock of the foreign corporation is owned by a foreign government the corporation is an instrumentality of the government and is entitled to the same immunity as the sovereign itself. We believe that when a government voluntarily enters into a commercial enterprise it can not claim immunity for the corporation which it controls; it can not detract from the independence and dignity of the nation which was hospitable to its corporation, and can not deprive that nation of jurisdiction over corporations in its own territory by making those corporations public agencies. We insisted our antitrust laws must be enforced in our own territory to the same extent as any of our laws, whether or not these laws are in harmony with the policy of other nations.

The above summation presents briefly what might be considered the defensive measures against illegal attacks by foreign monopolies, combinations, and controls. But there is affirmative legislation which gives our industries the opportunity to do business in those markets where the law differs from our own and where those interested would be at a disadvantage unless they were permitted to have the same sort of trade organization as their competitors.

On April 10, 1918, the Webb Export Trade Act was enacted. This act came as the result of an extensive investigation and report made by the Federal Trade Commission on the conditions of American export trade. The commission concluded that American exporters were at a great disadvantage in competing with European exporters because the Americans were under the disability of complying with the rule of competition laid down by the Sherman Act. It was recommended that American exporters be permitted to unite in associations so that they might present a solid front against foreign competition. This legislation relates exclusively to export trade of the United States, just as the antitrust provision of the Wilson Tariff Act related to the import trade of the United States. The Webb Export Trade Act, otherwise known as the Webb-Pomerene Act, is a recognition of the fact that in regions where antitrust laws are not in force American business men should be able to compete on a favorable basis with foreign cartels, controls, and monopolies. Before this act was passed it was believed that our antitrust laws were not applicable to these export trade associations, but it was felt that even if that were true all elements of doubt should be removed by affirmative legislation.

This act provides that the antitrust laws shall not be construed to prohibit associations entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade and actually engaged in such export trade. It provides further that agreements made or acts done in the course of such trade are not in violation of the Sherman law, if these agreements or acts do not constitute a restraint of trade within the United States and provided that such associations do not, in the United States or elsewhere, enter into any agreements which artificially or intentionally enhance or depress prices within the United States or substantially lessen competition within the United States. The Federal Trade Commission has a visitorial jurisdiction to regulate these export trade associations.

The report of the Federal Trade Commission for last year is interesting in that it shows the activity of our export associations in shipping raw material and manufactured goods. From that report it appears that 55 associations filed reports during the past fiscal year.

Exports totalling more than $200,000,000 were handled by these associations during 1926, and you will note particularly that chemical products, including caustic soda, soda ash, liquid chlorine, soda pulp, paints, and varnishes, totaled $3,100,000 and raw materials, such as phosphate rock, crude sulphur, etc., amounted to $14,300,000.

The Federal Trade Commission stated in its report that export associations had reported many advantages derived from operation under the act. Through their association member companies had been able to reduce their selling costs. Effective standardization had been obtained. Quality of products had been improved. Prices had been stabilized. Cutthroat competition had been eliminated. And a solid front to European competition had been presented.

It may be that American industry has not taken full advantage of this act, but, in any case, a very definite and constructive instrumentality has been furnished by the Government to those industries which are enterprising enough to utilize it.

Now, there is another phase of the current European industrial development that bears on the interests of consumers in this country. It frequently happens that raw materials controlled by foreign governments are produced or sold under conditions making it impossible for purchasers competing with one another to secure adequate supplies at a reasonable price. In fact, we have seen instances where such materials are produced under a definite governmental plan to restrict production and to enhance prices.

A vivid illustration is found in the so-called Stephenson plan governing the sale of crude rubber. Under the operation of that plan the individual American purchaser was under the absolute domination of foreign interests.

In order to meet that situation the purchasers of crude rubber in this country, which consumes 75 per cent of the world's supply, submitted a plan to the department for the formation of a rubber pool, which, by consolidating purchasing power, would enable buyers to go into the rubber market and obtain supplies at a fair price. It is the view of the department that so long as that association of rubber purchasers permits all who desire to participate to do so on equal terms and, in view of the fact that the purpose of the plan is to promote trade in this country rather than to restrain it, there is no violation of the Sherman law and no basis for proceedings by the Department of Justice. It may be interesting to note that during the operation of this plan the price of rubber has been substantially reduced and there has been no complaint of its operation in this country, excepting in one case, which, upon investigation, was found to have no merit.

A bill expressly sanctioning collective purchasing of raw materials in foreign markets has been introduced in the form of an amendment to the Webb-Pomerene Act. It provides that such associations shall enter into no agreement or understanding which would artificially or intentionally enhance prices or result in discrimination in the sale of commodities so imported to anyone desiring to buy such commodities for use in manufacturing goods in the United States.

It is quite clear, therefore, that Congress contemplates the enactment of constructive legislation not only to protect American industry from unwarranted attacks from abroad but to enable American industry to have a fair opportunity of meeting foreign competition in neutral markets.

You all know the intelligent and helpful service that is constantly rendered by the Department of Commerce to firms engaged in foreign trade.

This very conference is illustrative of the high degree of cooperation that exists between legitimate business and that department.

But all statutes and all the aid that governmental departments may give are of no avail unless there is an intelligent conduct of business itself. There are those who believe that the principle of competition means that a premium is placed on drastic and destructive competition; but the law itself has recognized that destructive competition is of no benefit, even to the consumer. Cooperation in industry is not forbidden. It has been pointed out by the Supreme Court that the Sherman law did not intend to place a penalty upon intelligence in business. A manufacturer is entitled to exercise the business virtues which are based upon a knowledge of actual conditions.

I am informed that your industry is developing a high degree of cooperation. That you have taken advantage of trade associations as a means for solving your problems. It is reported that there are some 40 trade associations existing in your industry and that they have been organized in every branch of the business. The attitude of the courts toward these associations, and the helpfulness of the Department of Commerce in furnishing guidance, ought to serve as an encouragement to proper cooperative effort.

The true course of conduct for trade associations has been laid down by certain decisions of the Supreme Court, and it is clear under those decisions that associations of competitors in any particular line of commerce which have solely for their purpose the collection and dissemination of statistical information as to the exact existing conditions and past transactions does not violate the antitrust laws. It is only where the collection and dissemination of information and its subsequent discussion leads to agreements as to prices, customers, or allocation of territory that the entire combination falls within the provisions of the Sherman law; and such conduct is forbidden for the very reason that persons and concerns agreeing to the imposition of arbitrary conditions must always submit themselves to the will of others. That condition finds no favor in the law and should find no favor in the commercial life of this country. It subordinates just ambition, initiative, and energy to immediate monetary profit, with the ultimate effect of hindering the development of those qualities which give life, energy, and success to individual business operations.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in order to avoid any question at all, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the unfinished business before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2, in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore entered, adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 22, 1928, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 21, 1928

POSTMASTERS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, February 21, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou art still our God, our Heavenly Father. Thy loving providence is still our perpetual accompaniment. How we do thank Thee that the world is not impelled by a blind, resistless, heartless force! The spirit of God has made us, and the breath of the Almighty has given us life; in Him we have our refuge and strength. Keep the windows of our souls open and lead us to a higher and higher valuation of the things of the spirit. We most humbly acknowledge the majesty and the glory of the Galilean Teacher. In Him, through Him, and for Him may we give ourselves to Thee and to the services of our Republic. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7201. An act to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 9280. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 7032. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Canton, Ky.;

H. R. 7033. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Iuka, Ky.;

H. R. 7034. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Smithland, Ky.;

H. R. 7035. An act authorizing the Midland Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near the mouth of Clarks River;

H. R. 7036. An act authorizing the Valley Bridge Co. (Inc.), of Paducah, Ky., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Eggners Ferry, Ky.; and

H. R. 8216. An act to confer authority on the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia to permit J. L. Sink, a bankrupt, to file his application for discharge and to authorize and empower the judge of said court to hear and determine the same.

W. H. CLARK AGAINST HAYS B. WHITE

Mr. COLTON, from the Committee on Elections No. 1, by direction of that committee, submitted a privileged report on the contested-election case of W. H. Clark against Hays B. White from the sixth congressional district of the State of Kansas, which was ordered printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS KANAWHA RIVER AT POINT PLEASANT, W. VA.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to prefer a unanimous-consent request in respect of a bill that was on the consent calendar yesterday and could not be reached. It is merely an extension of time within which to complete a bridge; an emergency exists, because the present law expires on the 2d of March next. The bill is H. R. 9843, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Kanawha River at or near the town of Henderson, W. Va., to a point opposite thereto in or near the city of Point Pleasant, W. Va.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman assures the Chair this is an emergency?

Mr. DENISON. Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have no interest in it, but the old franchise expires on the 2d of March next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has hitherto announced he would not recognize unanimous-consent requests to take up bridge bills out of order unless there was an emergency.

Mr. DENISON. I recognize that rule, Mr. Speaker, and I want to state that I will not move to reconsider the vote and lay that motion on the table; so that if anyone wishes to reconsider the bill that can done later by a proper motion, and I shall not resist such a motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1927, to be built across the Kanawha River at or near Henderson, W. Va., to a point opposite thereto at or near the town of Point Pleasant, W. Va., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "River," strike out the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in"; page 1, line 7, after the word "to," strike out the word "at" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in"; page 1, line 7, strike out the words "the town of."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

ALIEN PROPERTY

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

I will say to the House that there is only one amendment. The Senate has stricken out all after the enacting clause and has inserted an amendment. The principal features of the bill of the House, however, are preserved, and the amendment does not alter the essential structure of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. This is the alien property bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; this is commonly known as the alien property bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7201, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. GREEN of Iowa, HAWLEY, TREADWAY, GARNER of Texas, and COLLIER.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Why does not the gentleman get time under general debate on the District appropriation bill, which is to be immediately taken up?

Mr. ENGLAND. If I can do that, it will be satisfactory, except that my remarks will not refer to the general debate on the bill.

Mr. TILSON. General debate covers everything. There is nothing, so far as I know, that general debate does not cover.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The debate is on the general state of the Union.

Mr. ENGLAND. It does not make any special difference to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield the gentleman time later in the afternoon.

Mr. ENGLAND. That will be satisfactory.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, the regular annual appropriations, under which the District of Columbia government is operating for the fiscal year 1928, total $36,507,202.44, which includes $267,317.44 contained in the first deficiency act of 1928. The amount recommended for the fiscal year 1929 as contained in the President's Budget was $37,668,686. The amount that has been recommended by the committee on the accompanying bill is $37,035,235, an increase of $528,032.56 over the current year, and a decrease of $633,451 under the Budget estimates.

The following table will show the distribution of these figures between the various divisions and services of the municipal government. An explanation of the committee's action in each instance appears under the appropriate heading in this report, and an itemized tabulation of the figures appears on pages 19 to 41 of this report.

[1] These figures do not include an amount of $42,500 for the care and treatment of indigent patients at Freedmen's Hospital, the necessary amount for which has been transferred to and made a part of the Interior Department appropriation bill for 1929.

The committee reporting out this bill has included with its recommendations the current provision appropriating $9,000,000 lump sum as the Federal contribution to the District of Columbia expenses.

There are two ways in which to reduce taxes from the standpoint of the man who pays them. One is to shift the tax burden which rightly is his to the shoulders of some one else. The other way, and the correct way, is by reducing expenditures and thereby reducing the tax burden.

Ever since the Nation's Capital was located in Washington efforts have been made to shift the tax burden of the District to the United States. For many years the fiscal relations of the United States and the District were not on any orderly basis. About 1870 the régime of Mr. Shepherd began, with great outlays, extravagant expenditures, and much waste for city improvements and development. Just as any city that embarks upon such a program, the city of Washington could not carry such a load and the Nation was asked to help. The final outcome was that Congress abolished the government then in existence, guaranteed the payment of the city's indebtedness, and set up the present commissioner form of governing the Capital. As a part of that plan the act authorizing this change provided that the costs of operating the city should be paid 50 per cent by the District of Columbia and 50 per cent by the Federal Government. To some of the citizens of Washington the 50–50 plan is a sacred thing, not to be touched by mortal hands. It is interesting, therefore, to note how it came to be adopted originally as the basis of fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia. I quote now from W. B. Bryan's History of the Nation's Capital, volume 2, page 624:

* * * How was the District to go on? At the outset of the investigation Governor Shepherd answered that question when he told the committee of "the difficulty if not the impossibility of making the receipts meet the necessary expenditures" unless Congress did its part as a property holder. (Investigation, 1874, vol. 1, governor's answer, p. 469.) As to exactly what that part was he had stated officially only the previous year. (Report of Board of Public Works, p. 3, 1873.) It was one-half because, as he calculated, the Government owned one-half of the value of the real property in the District. To reach such a result, however, he placed a value of 30 cents a square foot on the streets and avenues. In this way he added 50 per cent to the valuation of Government property, consisting of the parks and reservations and public buildings. A year before it did not occur to him to include the streets, so that then his estimate of the value of the Government holdings did not go beyond two-thirds of that of other District property. (The same, 1872, p. 21. The thirty-three millions of street value brought the total up to ninety-six millions, the assessed value of private property.)

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman say that the streets of the city were included in the value placed upon the property of the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. When the original 50–50 plan was adopted they included the streets and avenues at 30 cents a square foot and charged them to the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is the most astonishing thing to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is no more astonishing than things that happened in 1928.

Thus by adding thirty-three millions of street value to the other values Governor Shepherd brought the Government's "property values" up to $96,000,000, equal to the assessed value of the private property in the District.

Mr. CRAIL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CRAIL. Was there any reason why the streets should be considered as the property of the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. The only reason was that they wanted the Government to pay more than they would pay if they had not put the streets in.

The 50–50 plan started off then on a decidedly questionable basis in the amount charged to the United States as a "property holder." That was in 1874. In 1876 a joint committee fixed the Federal share of the District at 40 per cent—Bryan's History, page 635—but the recommendation was not accepted. Then Mr. Bryan states, page 635:

* * * It is quite apparent, however, from the debate in 1878 that the half-and-half rate met with favor from a number, because of the impression or belief that the value of the Federal property in the District was about one-half of the entire property valuation. No statement was given upon which such a conclusion was based. The same was true in the case of a similar claim made by the citizens of the District, as represented by a committee of 100 in a memorial presented to Congress at the opening of the session in December, 1877. Only the total of Government property valuation was given in the memorial, nothing to show how it was arrived at. As the total was the same as the estimate made by Governor Shepherd in 1873, when he included the value of the street area at so much per square foot, it may be concluded that the committee adopted his figures. Moreover, Governor Shepherd was a member of the committee.

The memorial gave a review, based upon the reports of subcommittees, of the history of the District and its present needs and condition as the foundation for the contention that as the District was the National Capital, where the Government had large property interests as well as supreme authority, it should bear an equal share with the citizens in its maintenance and improvement. (The committee of 100 citizens of the District of Columbia to the Senate and House, Washington, 1877. Also reports of subcommittees in separate pamphlet, same date and place.) With a singleness of purpose not always possible in civic efforts, this committee had but one thing to ask, but one recommendation to make, and that was the adoption of the half-and-half rate. The zeal and earnestness with which the committee urged this matter is indicated by a remark made on the floor of the House that the change in the rate of 40 per cent, as proposed in the plan reported at the previous Congress, to 50 per cent "was doubtless under the pressure of the committee of 100 citizens." (RECORD, p. 2528, April 15, 1878. The officers of the committee were: Permanent chairman, George W. Riggs; vice presidents, Joseph Casey, L. J. Davis, D. K. Carter, John T. Given, C. S. Noyes, and John T. Mitchell; secretary, John A. Baker; treasurer, R. C. Fox.)

Arrived at in this uncertain and obviously unfair way, the 50–50 plan was followed by Congress down until 1922, when the 60–40 plan was adopted. Since 1925 the United States has contributed annually $9,000,000 in a lump-sum amount in cash to the District treasury and in addition has surrendered its right to a proportionate share of district revenues (to which it was entitled under the 60–40 plan) amounting to approximately $850,000 a year. The Government also furnishes to the District the services of Army officers, whose salaries amount to $89,000 a year. During the past five years $184,000 worth of Government property has been given to the District through the Chief Coordinator in the way of surplus material. In 1927 alone this amounted to $122,000. In addition to that, the District uses Government-owned property for city purposes of the assessed value of $13,742,911.14. A very nominal ground rental would amount to $142,000 a year. Thus it will be seen that the Federal Government contributes not only $9,000,000 to the District government, but much over $1,000,000 in addition thereto. In addition to all of that are many items, some small, others large, that constantly inure to the benefit of the District that no city in the United States receives. In the first instance is the $92,000,000 Federal program for land, buildings, bridges, and so forth, for which Congress has already appropriated. Also, the services of governmental bureaus such as the Bureau of Efficiency, the Bureau of the Budget, the Bureau of Standards, free band concerts, the right to purchase supplies through the General Purchasing Office, and so forth, all of which has much value but can not be estimated in dollars and cents.

It is not my purpose here to argue theories or state vague ideas of what the fiscal relations should be. We want the Congress to have the facts. It may then reach its own conclusion as to what should be done. The committee's conclusion is that the present Federal contribution to the District's revenues is not only fair but exceedingly generous.

Let us first approach the question from the angle that Governor Shepherd used, property values. At the request of certain District organizations the District assessor recently reported that the assessed value of Government realty in the District was $470,000,000, that of District government property $50,000,000, embassies, churches, etc., $75,000,000, or a total of $595,000,000 of tax-free property. He reported the assessed value of private property at $1,150,000,000. From these figures it will be seen that 34 per cent of the District's real property is nontaxable and 66 per cent subject to taxation. But 27½ per cent of the total is United States property.

In the seventies the total only of Government property was given "nothing to show how it was arrived at" was secured. I did not want to make the same mistake, so I asked the assessor to give me the details upon which his assessment was based. Upon his figures I found that of the $470,000,000 charged as Government property, $157,670,000 was property used for municipal purposes, legal title to which was in the United States, but the user in the District of Columbia. In 1877 all the streets and avenues were assessed and charged to the United States at 30 cents a square foot. In 1928 they assess and charge to the United States all the squares, circles, parks (including Rock Creek and Anacostia, and so forth), the Zoo, the jail, and city hospital, the Smithsonian buildings, the Red Cross and Pan American buildings, the city post office, the water front, the city water reservoir, the filtration plant, the city stables, and the Center Market, the industrial schools for the District children, the School for Deaf and Dumb, a police station, and a schoolhouse, and even the Highway Bridge is included. Also Judiciary Square and the courthouse. For revenue purposes the city collects rent from the Center Market, and the United States is asked to pay for water from the water system; but for tax purposes, they state that the Federal Government owns both. There will be found in the hearings a table of these values. Under no theory should they be included. Now, then, deducting the $157,670,000 that is Government property used for municipal purposes from the total of $470,000,000, there remains a total value of $312,330,000 for property used largely for Federal purposes, or less than 18 per cent of the total. In spite of that, Congress is asked by District people to pay 40 per cent of the taxes on 18 per cent of the property.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In that estimate did you accept the capital value?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have accepted all through the figures of the assessor.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I think they may well be questioned.

Mr. SIMMONS. The estimated tax rate next year will be $1.70 a hundred. Based on $470,000,000 worth of property, if the Government paid taxes, its tax would be $7,990,000; but it pays $9,000,000 plus other items which I have enumerated. Based on $312,330,000 of Government property used for Federal purposes, the Government's tax would be $5,309,610, and it contributes approximately $4,000,000 above this amount by its direct appropriation of $9,000,000. So there was no comfort in those figures for advocates of 60–40 and they have dropped them, and now when the assessor's figures are mentioned showing the values, they reply in a popular expression of the day: "I'd rather not hear any more about it."

There are no available figures as to the value of tangible personal property of the Government, but the assessed value of tangible personal property in the District subject to taxation is $105,000,000. Figuring on the same basis as the real property the $105,000,000 would be 66 per cent of the total. One hundred per cent would be $160,000,000 of tangible personal property subject to taxation. Eighteen per cent of that amounts to $28,800,000 as the relative estimated value of Government tangible property in the District used for Federal purposes. A tax rate of $1.70 on that would produce $509,600. Or a total on both real and personal property would be $5,819,210. Assuming that we should contribute to the District government the equivalent of what the property would produce in taxes, the amount would then be less than $6,000,000. Whatever is contributed by the Government beyond $6,000,000 is given over and above all equitable claims, and as a Federal contribution to the upkeep and beauty of the Nation's Capital.

What does the $9,000,000 we now contribute pay? Based on this bill it pays the entire cost of the public playgrounds, the public buildings and parks, National Capital Park and Planning Commission, including $600,000 for the purchase of land, the Zoo, Anacostia development, the police department, the fire department, and almost all of the salary roll of the city amounting to over $2,000,000. It is left for the people of Washington to pay only for their streets, their sewers, the courts, public welfare, electric lights, militia, schools, health department, and the collection of their refuse and other miscellaneous items amounting to about a quarter of a million dollars.

If the 60–40 plan were accepted for the fiscal year 1929 the United States would be called upon to contribute $13,466,734 and the District would be called upon to pay but $20,965,102 from general taxes. The tax rate would be then $1.20, and the rate would create in addition thereto a surplus of nearly one-half million dollars. Detailed figures will be placed in the RECORD.

Upon items in the bill, if the 60–40 plan were in force, the District would be called upon to pay only for the schools, the prisons, and charitable institutions, the courts, the collection of refuse, and the general salaries of employees of the city. While the United States would be asked to pay for the contingent expenses, all of the street improvements ($2,263,000) not covered by the gas tax, the sewer department, public playgrounds, electrical department (including street lighting), police department, fire department, health department, District militia, all the parks, $600,000 for new park lands, and the cost of operating the Zoo. To state it thus is to show how utterly absurd and unfair is the request that we return to the 60–40 plan.

Figuring the Government values at $341,130,000, by the Federal payment carried in this bill, we are charging the United States at a tax rate of $2.70, while the private holder pays a $1.70 rate. If the 60–40 plan were returned to, the private rate would be $1.20 and the United States rate would be $3.90 a hundred. What more need be said?

Bear in mind always in this discussion that the District tax rate includes all taxes on real and tangible personal property. Or stated another way, it includes all items generally known as school district, sanitary district, city, county, and State items.

In these calculations I have not included revenues from and expenses of the water department. It is a self-supporting activity. The board of trade, in its statement, has charged many things against the Federal Government. One that the city is "giving free water service" to the United States. What are the facts? I have pointed out that in fixing the value of United States property in the District there was included $19,622,441 for water reservoirs, and so forth, in the city system. Later on they claim to own the system and want us to pay both taxes on our system and water charges on their system. The present water system was started in 1853 and paid for and maintained entirely by the United States down to 1882. The people of Georgetown and Washington paid nothing for water save the expense of tapping the mains. Beginning in 1882 the water system was maintained out of District revenues to which the United States contributed one-half and the revenues of the system went into the general fund of the District. From 1917 to date the water system has been maintained out of its own revenues. The water rates are like Washington taxes—low—due to the fact that the United States bought and paid for the system, maintained it for years, and in effect gave it to the District. Other cities have paid for their own water systems. At the present time the total United States investment in the system is $11,953,700. The total District investment is $11,266,213. In other words, the water system is owned jointly by the United States and the District of Columbia, the Federal Government owning slightly more than one-half. In addition to that $24,753,863 from earnings have been invested in the system.

The United States receives from the water system, of which it is half owner, 3,311,481 m. g. of water, or a return of 2.21 per cent on the investment that it has made in the plant. The District of Columbia receives 8,103,525 m. g., which makes a return of 5.75 per cent on its investment. In addition the District's return in extensions to the property brings the gross return to the District up to 7.13 per cent. Contrast the Federal return of 2.21 per cent with the District's return of 7.13 per cent, and the conclusion is reached that if anyone is receiving free water it is the District and not the United States. (See table, p. 945 of the hearings.)

What is Washington's comparative tax rate with other cities? You will find in the hearings a table taken from the Bureau of the Census publication "Financial statistics of cities, 1925," Washington is in the class of 500,000 or more population. That table shows the per capita levy in Washington for all purposes at $30.31, the lowest of the group. St. Louis is next, with $34.28; Baltimore, $37.58; San Francisco, for city purposes only, $42.94; Milwaukee, for city purposes only, $47.69; Philadelphia, for city purposes only, $42.81; Cleveland, $54.08; Buffalo, $55.15; New York, $55.80; Chicago, $56.08; Pittsburgh, for city purposes only, $58.15; Detroit, $57.34; Boston, $63.63. So those who want an increased Federal contribution find no aid in that table. Then, in the hearings are tables from financial statistics of cities for 1926, prepared by the Bureau of the Census. Those tables show that Washington is third lowest in the payment of general property taxes in cities of its population group, Washington having a per capita levy of $36.87, while Boston goes to $72.78. Baltimore and St. Louis have a smaller per capita levy, $34.15 and $35.05. But it must be noted that this table includes the levy for city purposes only, whereas the other cities in the group must have in addition their State and other taxes, amounting in 1925 to $4.12 for Baltimore and $1.47 for St. Louis. So that with those figures included Washington will have the lowest per capita levy in 1926 of any city in its size group save St. Louis. Likewise the general property revenues for 1926 are the lowest in Washington of any city in its class, lowest in earnings of public service enterprise and lowest in all other revenues. Likewise there are but three cities showing a lower per capita operation and maintenance cost. The committee has before it the comparative tax rates for cities for 1927, issued by the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research. After adjusting the tax rate to a uniform 100 per cent basis of assessment and adjusting values, the final adjusted tax rate for Washington is given at $15.30 (the District assessor says it should be $16.20) per $1,000, actual value. Taking either of the two rates Washington is shown to have the lowest tax rate per actual value of property of any of the first 34 cities of the United States.

COMPARATIVE TAX RATES OF 249 CITIES, 1927

(By C. E. Rightor, Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research. Mr. Rightor's annual report on tax rates is becoming a standard)

The accompanying table presents in summary form a record of the tax rates upon property as levied in 1927 for all cities over 30,000 population in the United States and Canada replying to the questionnaire.

There is nothing complex about the compilation. Most of the readers of the Review are acquainted with this table for past years, and the same information is furnished this year.

It is recognized that the general property tax has been and continues to be the major source of revenue of cities. The Census Bureau's "Financial statistics of cities over 30,000, 1925," the latest available report, shows that 63.7 per cent of all revenue receipts of 247 cities were from this source. Incidentally this report discloses that 35.3 per cent of the Nation's population is in cities over 30,000.

It is found to be of much concern, therefore, to taxpayers, both large and small, to know how the taxes in one city compare with other cities, and how the levies for the several purposes compare. The figures here presented furnish this information for the current year—the total tax rate per $1,000 assessed valuation, and a subdivision of the total as to the amount each for city, school, county, and State (in Canada, Province) purposes. The assessed valuation upon which the rates are levied is reported also, with the percentages each of realty and personalty.

[1] Does not include any supplemental, deficiency, or new legislation appropriations, need for which may arise in the fiscal year 1929.

Because the legal basis of assessment in some States varies from 100 per cent, which is the predominant basis, it is desirable to adjust the rates to a uniform 100 per cent basis of assessment in all cases, thus permitting a correct and direct comparison between cities. This is done in the column entitled "Adjusted tax rate."

Further, because it is accepted that the legal basis of assessment (100 per cent of true or cash value) can not be realized generally in actual practice, attempt is made to indicate what the actual tax burden in each city would be were the full value used in assessing. This is done in the last two columns. These two columns, important as the actual facts would be, must represent merely the best estimates that can be made.

The cities are presented in order of population, by the five census groups, the Census Bureau's 1926 estimates being used again this year, as the 1927 estimates were not available. An official revised census taken in a few cities since 1926 is used. These estimates do not take care of extraordinary conditions affecting some cities and therefore per capita comparisons made without considering the facts in each case might lead to unwarranted conclusions.

The figures present their own case, largely. There are many reasons for estimates being required in cases and for a note of explanation owing to local circumstances. Here, again, the tax rates may be compared only when the particular facts respecting each city are known.

I will not trouble you further with statistics. Everything shows that the Washington taxpayer is in a very advantageous position compared with other cities and that he has nothing about which he can rightly complain so far as taxes are concerned, but, rather, he should be thankful for the privilege of living in the Nation's Capital, one of the many benefits being low taxes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I want to thank the gentleman for his able presentation of this matter. It is something I wanted to know for a long time. I hope the local papers will present the proposition fairly and completely. As I read the papers it is an unfair position they have taken. It is only due to us that they publish a full account as presented by the gentleman from Nebraska this morning, and I hope they will do it. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman speaks of intangible property. Does he have the rate and the method of collection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not that now.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is the gentleman going to take that up?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it is a special tax rate.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does the gentleman know what it is?

Mr. SIMMONS. Five dollars to the thousand.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is any compulsory return demanded?

Mr. SIMMONS. They think they are getting a fair average of intangible property.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman would not say that they are getting a fair average if they are not subjected to compulsory returns?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are supposed to return intangible property.

Mr. GIFFORD. In many places they are supposed to make a return on intangible property, but do not. The gentleman understands the motive of my question, that if intangible property was forced to make returns there would be an extraordinary low rate of taxation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and the board of trade claims the intangible fax is high and that the return is high.

Mr. GIFFORD. What authority has the gentleman for making the statement that the return is high, that there is a fairly honest return?

Mr. SIMMONS. I base that on figures submitted to us by the board of trade as one of the items for lowering the real and tangible rate in the District.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not understand that the gentleman from Nebraska did make that statement, but that somebody else did.

Mr. GIFFORD. I understand that in the gentleman's own State of Illinois, if they are pressed too hard they make a return.

Mr. MADDEN. But we are not trying that case at this time. We are trying the case of the city of Washington. Perhaps if we did try somebody else we might take up Massachusetts. In the meantime, we are doing a very good job if we are doing it well here.

Mr. GIFFORD. And I might say that only by comparison can we arrive at a proper conclusion. For instance, Massachusetts did gather some $16,000,000 from one individual from Illinois when that State pressed him too hard. I wondered if Washington had not a lot of Illinois citizens here at the present time.

Mr. MADDEN. Sometimes we do have a few.

Mr. SIMMONS. The board of trade charge that the District is limited in area and does not have the taxable property within its jurisdiction that other cities have. Population estimates show Washington thirteenth in population. In area, Washington is eleventh in the United States. The cities of St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Boston, San Francisco, and Buffalo have a greater population and less area, so that statement can not be sustained. They further charge an excessive operation and maintenance is due "to the Federal demands for service." That charge is not sustained and the opposite is true. They likewise state that the District pays for matters "truly national in character." But that likewise was abandoned by its proponents as untenable. The board of trade again charge that the high cost of the city government is due to demands in the way of street cleaning, policing, paving, repairing, giving fire protection, laying mains and sewers over and above the needs of the city proper. Throughout the hearings you will find the evidence negativing each of those propositions, and when the board of trade appeared before the committee they made no mention of those claims.

The committee finds that it is proper to consider in this connection the salary roll of the Federal Government, the great expenditures here annually for maintenance of the Federal establishment, the business that it brings to Washington, tourists, visitors, and so forth, and last but by no means least, the great expenditures for lands and buildings of the United States, appropriations for which have recently been made. Mention is made of the property south of Pennsylvania Avenue to be purchased by the Government.

Three of the Washington newspapers in the last three or four days, since the committee has reported this bill, as a reason for greatly increasing the Federal contribution, have referred to the fact that $17,000,000 worth of assessed property south of Pennsylvania Avenue is to be taken out of the tax columns because of purchase by the Federal Government. We went into that matter with the assessor. You will find it on page 79 of the hearings, where the assessed value of the property is shown, and what it pays in taxes.

The assessor testified that the removal of that property from the tax rolls would not decrease revenues. His reason being that the building will be rebuilt on other tax-paying sites, and the equivalent be subject to taxation. He further states that the Government is paying excessive prices, which money will largely be invested elsewhere in the city. Also, that the increased assessment values on property north of Pennsylvania Avenue will largely make the difference. So that no consideration should be given to that situation as an argument for increased contribution by the United States.

Let me repeat, then, we have reached the conclusion that not only is there no basis for the claim that the Federal contribution is too low, but that it is exceedingly generous, and, if anything, is too high, giving Washington an advantageous tax position not enjoyed by cities elsewhere in the United States.

I stated in the beginning that the correct way to reduce taxes is to reduce expenditures, not by refusing funds where needed, but by efficient, economical expenditures of public funds to reduce the total cost of city government. We are reporting to you a bill $633,451 below the Budget estimates. This, if accepted, will enable the District Commissioners to reduce the estimated tax rate at least 5 cents per hundred.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman the other day made an interesting and clear statement of the school situation in response to misrepresentations on the part of a certain newspaper in the District. Did that particular newspaper or any other Washington newspaper use any material portion of the gentleman's statement in the House?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not a bit of it.

Mr. CRAMTON. So that from that experience and other past experiences the House may really believe that the hope expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that the Washington newspapers would make any fair presentation of the gentleman's statement to-day, can only be realized if Congress makes an appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the only way that this statement can be gotten to the people of the city of Washington would be for Congress to appropriate a sum of money and use it for sending out this statement to the people of the District. I doubt very much if the District newspapers will do anything more than make a general statement regarding what I have said. Frankly I have asked two of them to be fair with us and to report fully what I have said. We will see whether or not they do it. The other way for us to do that, and that I am going to do so far as my time will permit, is to accept invitations that I receive and go out and tell these facts to the people of the District.

SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The committee during the hearings upon the estimates for the next fiscal year went particularly into the question of the salaries of employees of the District of Columbia under the classification act, which does not include teachers, firemen, and policemen. A comparison was made with the salaries being received by employees in the executive departments and independent establishments in the Federal Government under the same act. In making this comparison the committee had before it the statement appearing on page A–110 of the Budget for 1929, which shows the average number of employees, the average salary rates, and the total salary obligations for all employees in the District of Columbia listed under the different Federal establishments, including the District of Columbia, for the years 1927, 1928, and 1929. With the exception of employees under public buildings and public parks of the National Capital, which service is hardly comparable, as most of those employees are grouped under the custodial grades, the average salary for the employees of the District of Columbia was the lowest of the 33 departments and bureaus listed. The District of Columbia employees are not only receiving the lowest rates in comparison to the rates received by employees in the Federal Government under the same law, but a very large proportion of them are and have been for some time at the minimum rates of their respective grades.

In order to bring the employees of the District of Columbia up to a fair comparison with the other departments specified in the tabulation, the committee ascertained the total amount that would be necessary to bring the salaries of the District employees up to the average salary rates of those grades. This amount was $340,750, as shown in the statement on pages 966 and 967 of the hearings upon the bill. The committee then divided this amount into a two-year program of salary readjustment, one-half to be included and distributed among the various divisions of the District government in the accompanying bill for 1929, and the second half to be included in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930. One-half of the amount necessary would represent $170,375. The estimates submitted to the committee originally contained $37,555 for salary increases. The estimated savings anticipated during the fiscal year 1929 due to lapses in salaries represents $12,600. This left a balance necessary to be included in the 1929 bill of $121,245, if one-half of the total amount of $340,750 for salary readjustments was to be appropriated for this year. The committee has included this additional amount in excess of the Budget estimate and distributed it under the respective divisions of the District government appearing in the bill. This will allow a total, therefore, for the purpose of salary increases for 1929 of $171,400, which is about $1,025 more than one-half of the amount required. This is due to the fact that several divisions already were slightly over the total amount necessary to meet salary recommendations.

While the committee recognizes that any increases in pay under the classification act are contingent upon the appropriations made available annually by Congress for that purpose, it is of the opinion that appropriations should be sufficient to permit an equitable adjustment of salaries under that act based on proper efficiency ratings. The action taken in this case has been prompted by the fact that District employees have not been given as much recognition in the salary adjustment as their status under the law would warrant by comparison with the departments of the Government. It is the belief of the committee that the salary situation is more acute in those grades where the lower rates of pay apply and the amount recommended has been allowed with the understanding that first consideration in its application will be toward relief in those grades to employees whose efficiency ratings are such as to deserve recognition. The statistical table referred to that appears in the hearings shows the distribution of the increase allowed by the committee for this purpose.

MUNICIPAL ARCHITECT'S OFFICE

The estimate for the fiscal year 1929 provided for an appropriation of $30,540, for the office of the municipal architect, of which amount $14,040 was allocable to the District repair shop. Under a proposed reorganization plan for this office, which originally was proposed by the Bureau of Efficiency and adopted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, it is proposed in the bill to increase the amount to $52,240, providing a salary schedule for the municipal architect's office proper of $38,200, an increase of $21,700 over 1928, and $14,040—the same amount as the current year—for allocation to the District repair shop. The reorganization plan contemplates the appointment of an assistant municipal architect, placing the personnel of the office on a comparable basis with other similar offices in the Federal Government, establishing a permanent skeleton organization consisting of certain key positions which would be essential irrespective of the size of the construction program each year, and establishing lump-sum apportionments of 3 per cent of the appropriations for construction work up to $2,000,000, and 2½ per cent on appropriations over $2,000,000, for the use of the municipal architect's office in payment for the services of draftsmen, assistant engineers, clerks, copyists, and inspectors to be employed on the construction work provided for by such appropriations.

The preparation of all plans will take place in the municipal architect's office and be paid from such apportionments, and no appropriations will be made specifically for the preparation of plans for individual projects as has been done heretofore. Under this reorganization it has been possible to deduct from the estimates submitted a total of $16,500 that had been included for the payment of personal services for the preparation of plans for different school buildings, which plans will now be prepared in the architect's office. It is believed that the adoption of this plan of reorganization will facilitate the work of the office and expedite the construction of school buildings and other projects and will insure the maintenance of a more efficient organization.

OFFICE OF THE CORPORATION COUNSEL

There is recommended for the office of the corporation counsel a total appropriation of $58,340, which is an increase over the current year of $12,380. This increase covers the following additional personnel: One assistant corporation counsel at $5,200 to take charge of the more important condemnation work and to assist in handling the increase in this type of work; one assistant at $3,000 to assist in the work before the police court; $2,640 added by the committee for additional stenographic services that are very much needed in the office; and $1,540 additional for salary increases. With these additions to the present staff the corporation counsel's office will be in a position to handle the increase of work that has arisen during the past several years.

SURVEYOR'S OFFICE

An additional amount of $11,190 has been recommended for the expenses of the surveyor's office, bringing the total annual appropriation for 1929 up to $79,050. Heretofore provision has always been made for temporary services and materials to take care of the extra work in the office during the busy seasons of the year, and $5,000 appropriated therefor. Under the proposed bill there is provided $6,180 for an additional field party that is needed and $3,180 for some additional permanent employees in lieu of the $5,000 for temporary services. There has also been included $1,830 for salary increases under the committee's proposal.

OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF TRAFFIC

The estimates submitted for the office of the director of traffic were divided into two funds, one for salaries amounting to $28,320, an increase over 1928 of $3,020 and one for expenses totaling $50,000, which represented a reduction under 1928 of $20,000. The increase proposed in the salary item covered for the most part two new positions, one at $1,680 and one at $1,020. The amount for these two new positions the committee has disallowed, believing that there is no necessity for additional personnel at this time. The balance of the increase of $320 for salary increases the committee has allowed and has added an additional $320. Under the estimate for expenses, there was $5,000 asked for the purpose of making a traffic survey or count. This the committee has disallowed, bringing the estimate of $50,000 down to a recommended appropriation of $45,000. The committee was informed last year, and again this year, that any survey of traffic that might be needed could be made by the police department and has therefore recommended the elimination of the amount proposed to be used for that purpose.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY

The total amount recommended for the items making up the free public-library service is $332,935, which is an increase of $32,515 over the current year and $18,035 over the Budget estimates. The original increase presented to the committee was largely covered by a request for 10 new positions—6 in the central library, 1 in the southeastern branch, 1 in the Takoma Park branch, and 2 for the Chevy Chase-Tenley sub-branches. These increases the committee has allowed and in addition thereto has added $9,190, distributed over the several funds affected for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a branch library on Conduit Road in a vacated school building now available for that purpose. The estimates also provided for $1,280 for salary increases and to this amount the committee has added $8,845, making a total of $10,125 available for 1929 to assist in readjusting salaries of the respective grades. The salary rates of the employees in the public-library service have been noticeably low and it is hoped that with this amount and a similar amount for the year 1930 in conjunction with the salary-increase program that the committee has adopted, that the salaries of the employees here will be brought to a parity with employees in the other divisions of the District government.

OFFICE OF THE RECORDER OF DEEDS

The committee has included a provision under the office of the recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia whereby expenditures from appropriations under the recorder's control shall be made and accounted for in the manner provided by law for the other appropriations of the District of Columbia. This proviso will bring the expenditures for the office under the same system of accounting that all the other branches of the District government undergo and is suggested to make the service consistent throughout.

STREET AND ROAD IMPROVEMENT REPAIR

The committee has recommended $3,923,060 for street and road improvement repairs, which is an increase of $9,317.56 over the current year and a reduction of $309,940 under the Budget estimates. This amount is distributed over the following items:

GASOLINE TAX, ROAD AND STREET FUND

For paving, repaving, grading, and otherwise improving streets, avenues, and roads under the gasoline tax, road and street fund, the committee has reduced the Budget estimate by $90,000, making available for this purpose for 1929, $1,660,000. This is an apparent increase over 1928 of $173,500, but is actually a decrease of $20,600 under 1928, because during that year there was a total of $194,100 for specific street improvements payable from revenue other than gasoline-tax money.

Under the provisions of the act creating this fund, which provides for the collection of a charge of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels sold within the District of Columbia with certain exceptions, the fund to be available solely for street and road improvement and repair, the amount has increased each year to such an extent that now it is estimated for 1929 the fund will be large enough to continue all work from this one source of revenue and not as heretofore under another appropriation that was chargeable to regular District revenue.

The committee, following its usual custom, made a personal inspection of all the individual street items listed for paving and improvement and was satisfied with the program submitted to the extent that it has not recommended a change in any of these items and has included them all as estimated. The reduction of $90,000, noted above, was made in the amount available for the construction of curbs and gutters or concrete shoulders for roadways. This brought the estimate down to an available amount of $200,000. In making this reduction the committee was guided by the thought that the District is well up generally on its program of different street and roadway improvements and that the $200,000 allowed for this purpose will be amply sufficient to carry this phase of the work for 1929.

REPAIRS TO STREETS, AVENUES, AND ALLEYS

The amount recommended by the committee for this purpose is $1,475,000. Prior to this bill there have been two appropriations for street repairs—one for repairs in the old city and one for repairs to suburban roads. There was no logical or reasonable line of demarcation between the two classifications of streets for repair purposes. A large part of the so-called suburban roads are actually city streets. The amount appropriated for 1928 under these two funds was $1,310,000, so that the appropriation of $1,475,000 in this bill for the combined purposes is an increase of $165,000.

The estimate submitted was divided into three types of work—resurfacing, $800,000; repairing suburban roads, $375,000; and minor repairs to paved streets, $500,000. The committee reduced the resurfacing item $200,000, making available for 1929 for this purpose $600,000. In making this reduction it recognizes that this is part of a set program of resurfacing old and worn-out streets, and instead of estimating for the following year (1910) $400,000 for this purpose, as the plan proposed, it would be well to divide the amount between the two years, giving $600,000 this year instead of $860,000 this year and next year such amount as may be necessary to complete the work. This is believed to be sound, in view of the fact, as heretofore stated, that the District program for street and road improvement is being carried on as rapidly as is necessary.

RECONSTRUCTION AND REPLACEMENT OF BRIDGES

There is included in the bill $178,000 as estimated in the Budget for the replacement of the roadway floor of the Highway Bridge over the Potomac River. The original floor constructed of buckle plate in 1907 is rapidly deteriorating under the heavy traffic strain imposed upon it by conditions existing to-day, and it is proposed with the sum allowed to put in a laminated floor with asphalt surface on steel beams.

PUBLIC CONVENIENCE STATIONS

The usual appropriation of $28,000 for the maintenance of four existing convenience stations is included in the bill. There is also included a provision making available certain unexpended amounts of prior appropriations, totaling $39,500, for the construction of a new convenience station at Thirty-second and M Streets NW.

PUBLIC PLAYGROUNDS

The total amount recommended for the public-playground system is $190,610, which represents an increase over the present fiscal year of $18,645, and a decrease under the Budget estimates of $1,770. The estimates proposed the opening of two new playgrounds, one at Kalmia Road, between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets NW., and the other at Fourth and M Streets SW. Because of the sparse population in the vicinity of the site proposed as a playground at Kalmia Road, the committee feels that the recommendation is excessive at this time and accordingly deducted $2,565 from the salary roll for the additional positions necessary for this proposed playground and reduced the general maintenance item $1,800 for the same reason. In carrying out its plan for salary readjustment, however, it has added an additional amount over the Budget estimate in the salary fund of $3,795, which, together with the $785 already added in the Budget for such purpose, makes available $4,580 for the year 1929 for salary increases.

POLICE DEPARTMENT

A total of $3,150,269 has been recommended for the police department for the next fiscal year. This is $61,509 more than is available for the current year and $58,911 less than the amount estimated in the Budget. The salary roll in the bill is divided into two separate amounts, one for the pay and allowances of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force, the estimate for which was $2,820,000, including $45,000 for the salaries of 25 additional policemen, and the other for clerical and other personal services in the District of Columbia, for which there was estimated $76,640. The committee disallowed the 25 additional policemen requested and reduced the appropriation by $45,000. The police department was conducting its own garage and had 10 policemen on duty, receiving the salary commensurate with a policeman's duties but actually doing the work of mechanics. By an arrangement with the commissioners, all of this work was transferred to the regular District garage, where it should properly be, thus releasing 10 men for actual police duty. An additional policeman assigned to the night traffic court will be released for regular duty if the committee's recommendation with reference to closing that court is followed. This will release 11 policemen for actual patrol service.

There was submitted to the committee by the superintendent of police a list showing assignments of 152 policemen where the work could be as well or better done by clerical personnel at lower rates of pay. This number included 57 station policemen performing various clerical duties necessary for the transaction of the departmental business in the different stations and bureaus, and 54 detailed as drivers. The committee selected a number totaling 78 of the specially assigned police, which includes the 57 detailed as station clerks but does not include the 54 detailed as drivers, for absorption into the regular duty force at the average rate of six and one-half positions a month as vacancies occur on the force. These vacancies have been averaging well over a hundred a year for the past three years. It then deducted from the appropriation for the pay of police $80,272.92, which represents the total average pay of 78 policemen eliminated at the rate of six and one-half a month during the fiscal year. At the end of the next fiscal year there will be just as many policemen on regular duty as there are now, but the appropriation will be less in amount by 78 positions.

To accomplish this and to offset the clerical vacancies in the department occasioned by the transfer of the 78 policemen now detailed as clerks to active duty on the force, the committee increased the appropriation for clerical services by $69,286.92, which represents a total of the average salaries that it will be necessary to pay to clerks to fill these vacancies as they occur from month to month. In recommending this procedure the committee had two motives: First, a proper economy of administration in the police department; and, second, a proper employment of policemen for real police duties. The positions that are clerical in character can just as well, if not better, be filled by persons trained for clerical work than they are now being filled by men trained for police duties. The saving on a complete annual basis by this transfer should be about $30,000. The superintendent of police has made the recommendation and the committee concurs in it. In view of the reduction of the 25 positions requested and the substitution of clerks for policemen, a consequent decrease of $5,775 has been made in the uniform allowance appropriation.

TRAFFIC-CONTROL POLICEMEN

In the bill for the fiscal year 1927, an appropriation was carried for the installation of traffic-control lights in the business section of the city. Charts were submitted showing that all the business section of the city could be controlled by electric signals, 54 permanent duty traffic police relieved for other duty and in addition 41 others relieved from duty during rush hours. Last year the traffic director suggested some changes in this plan, but it was left without material change. The statement was made to us last year that 50 policemen could be relieved from traffic duty and assigned to other duties. The money was reappropriated and is now available.

We have had a change of commissioners and a change of traffic directors. They now propose to materially change the plans of light installation in two important particulars. First, certain of the down-town streets are to remain police and not electric light controlled and the 50 police are not to be relieved from traffic duty.

This committee feels that the present commissioners and present traffic director are bound by the actions of their predecessors as to carrying out a program that had been submitted and approved by Congress in regard to establishing these traffic lights. We expect the lights to be installed where for two years we have been told they would be installed. We likewise expect the release of traffic police to other duties.

Washington has the largest number of police per capita of any city in the United States. There is no justification for any increase in that number. It is my opinion that the commissioners and the traffic director are giving entirely too much consideration to the wishes of the street-car companies, the bus lines, and taxi concerns in traffic matters; that far too many privileges are accorded them and too little consideration and protection given to the rights of the ordinary citizen in street and traffic matters. [Applause.]
